Best in Shape

Alicia Orr and Alessandra Miele, our cover girls and the owners of newcomer North End Yoga, offer yet another sign that our city has joined the wellness bandwagon. Boston's Little Italy, after all, is known as a destination for getting full, not fit. But these days, yoga is about as exotic as spaghetti. Everybody's tried it.

With so many downward-facing dogs, perhaps we'll make Men's Fitness' annual list of the healthiest towns this year (let's not talk about 2007). The Brookings Institution, a Washington, D.C., think tank, recently named Boston America's second most walkable city, which can't hurt either. In fact, the Hub has all sorts of services geared toward getting its residents in shape.

And we've got the bruises to prove it. That's right, bruises, because beauty and health has gone extreme at local spas and gyms. In this issue, we explore treatments, like cupping, guaranteed to make a good story and have you feeling better. We recommend you incorporate one into your routine. Soon, Men's Fitness will crown us numero uno. You hear us, Albuquerque?

WALKING TALL

Boston's dense streets, snaking gardens and nonexistent parking spots have made it, by nature and design, a walking city. Even in the frozen soup of a January Nor'easter, it's usually quicker to hoof it than to endure the vagaries of the T or the traffic. So when Washington, D.C.'s Brookings Institution published a report last month claiming that Washington, not Boston, was America's premier walking city, Bostonian pride (always as fragile as last year's baseball records) felt prickled.

Typical of Washingtonians to ignore history. We New Englanders are such devoted pedestrians that we founded world famous footwear companies like Converse, New Balance and Rockport. Not to mention, we'd be total porkers if we gave it up.

Consider: A person walking at 3 mph burns about 100 calories per mile. An old-fashioned Dunkin' Donut packs 280 calories. That means you have to walk farther than the length of the Freedom Trail (2.5 miles) to shed a typical Boston breakfast. Of course, there are an awful lot of Dunkin's on the way to Quincy Market.

ENDIVE IN
Orinoco's Palmito gives greenery a good name.

Good Eats

Wild at Heart A typical restaurant salad selection goes something like this: House, Caesar, Greek. Cobb, if you're lucky. There also might be a trendy toss of mesclun, nuts, dried fruit and goat cheese. As for the dressing options, you can probably recite them as readily as your server.

Being healthy shouldn't be so boring. Thankfully at Orinoco, it's not. The Venezuelan eatery in the South End (soon to be joined by a sibling location in Brookline Village) serves a trio of inspired ensaladas that would renew any carnivore's faith in lighter fare.

Our favorite, the Palmito, combines namesake hearts of palm with peppery endive, baby lettuce and vinaigrette thickened with Spanish cabrales. It comes garnished with bacon-wrapped dates so scrumptious, they've become a menu item of their own.

Drink of the Moment

Fight Xerosis, Embrace Cirrhosis

I'm immediately suspicious of the Beta-carrotini. Carrot juice tastes healthful, an adjective with tenuous correlation to flavorful. But Great Bay bar manager Jonathan Henson is also the creator of a drink called Dr. Huxtable's Ugly Sweater, so he gets a free pass from my dubiety.

An evolved gin and juice, the Beta-carrotini impresses with its presentation. It's orange, but not basketball, traffic cone, utilitarian orange. It's sexy, "Can I buy a Carrotini for the woman at the end of the bar?" orange. And olive oil infused with parsley and basil dots the surface, creating a bubble-tea effect.

Sips start sweet as the OJ hits the tip of your tongue, but the carrot juice provides strong counterbalance and a finish that's on the sophisticated side of earthy. This is a drink for high-society hippies. Henson adds, "There's nothing worse than ordering a cocktail and having it be cloying."

SNOW BLOWHARD

TO THE SOUTH END YUPPIES, royals and young single women: Will you please shovel out your cars when it snows! Yes, if you shovel then someone else will pull in. But if everyone shoveled there'd be more parking spaces when you got home at day's end. On the morning after the Thursday snow storm, I witnessed Muffie loading little bleary-eyed Tyler and Morgan into their car seats, throwing her dark green SUV into jet propulsion and leaving tire tracks through a mound of plowed snow (no one can get into that space). Then I watched one of the hair-gelled royals barely brush off his red Audi (gotta love the disco music screaming through his closed car doors), and he too launched through the snow. Then the vacuous blonde 20-something spent 15 minutes spinning the tires on her black Volkswagen until she freed herself (ah, the smell of burning rubber). Folks: We're in this together. If everyone shovels, it can still be all about you, since you'll have a spot when you get home.

One Who Respectfully Shovels

What a new year indeed...

As the ball drops and 2007 turns into 2008, I am grateful to be able to spend my last hours (as well as my first hours, heh heh) of the year with you. Hopefully this will truly be a sign of things to come as the last few years have been tough to get through and already this year has offered a sense of hope that has been lost lately. Is this the start of something new? Only time will tell. I'm willing to put that time in to find out if you are.

Your Baby New Year

To the gentleman who turned my somewhat lackluster night working the hostess stand into high-quality entertainment:

Thank you. After serenading me with a well-meaning but off-key rendition of "Sweet Caroline," then apologizing to me for having to put up with your wildly drunk friend, you tipped me and thanked me for "doing God's work." No, sir. I believe it's you that's the divine inspiration.

The Happy Hostess

Unrequited crush? Bad hair? Need to vent? Send your e-mails of love and spleen to impersonals@improper.com, or fax 617-859-1446.

Take some oil and call me in the morning.

Question for John Paul, AAA Car Doctor

What do you have on hand to help survive the Boston winter?

BRUSHES

I keep one good snow brush, one longer snow broom to get the very top of my car (you don't want to be one of those people who drives around with a foot of snow on the roof) and a small snow shovel or one of those fold-up camping shovels in the back.

DEICER

I always have a can of window deicer in there. I get the ones with the built in ice scraper—that way you don't end up having to use your credit card to clean the window.

EXTRAS

One of those shiny NASA blankets is good for two reasons: First, it keeps you warm in case of a breakdown, and second, if you ever need to change a tire it provides a great cushion. I also keep an extra pair of gloves, boots and a poncho in the back. If you ever find yourself waiting out in the cold after an accident, you don't want to have to do it standing in slush up to your ankles.

RICH LEVINE

Woman 2: Aw, thanks. But let me tell you something, it's not even real. Here's my secret: You make sure your clothes look nice, make sure your nails look all pretty and people are always gonna assume your jewelry is real.

Going Out

LOBBY MAKES ITS ENTRANCE

In a hotel, the lobby plays many roles. It's menagerie, holding pen and destination. Such heterogeneity is what the creators of Lobby Bar & Kitchen hope to highlight in their small nook on Broad Street in Boston. "'Small' being intimate, not claustrophobic," GM Candace Smith clarifies. "We want people coming in and picking what they want to do."

The tight quarters feature a bar and a nine-seat lounge flanked by dining tables. Awash in dark woods, warm colors and brass accents, the decor beckons the Financial District crowd to unwind. As do the waiters, with rolled sleeves and orange Windsors hanging loose from their necks, serving cocktails like the Mellow Yellow ($10)—Stoli Blueberi, pear nectar, Apfel Korn and lemon.

The kitchen is led by Donley Liburd, a stout St. Thomas native not lacking for confidence. "A lot of places have signature dishes," Liburd says. "Myself, I'm just going to come hard with it at all angles." Incorporating fruits and spices, his American menu shows global influences, from small plates like the barbecue duck confit quesadilla ($13) to entrees like the braised short ribs ($27), cut Korean-style and served with curried onion relish.

"With less tables, we have a little more time to spend on the food," he says. "It's just good times, man. That's what we're going for, good times."

NICK ALTSCHULLER

THE NORTH END IS NIGH

Salem Street is one of Boston's most historic addresses, home to hallowed sites like the Old North Church and Ernesto's Pizza. There's hardly a road in town that's proven as impregnable to the march of time. But the block of Salem heading northeast between Wiget and Parmenter has, quite utterly, lost the fight against the awesome power of cute designer boutiques. The evidence: Shake the Tree (95 Salem St., 617-742-0484), a twee, floral-colored space in which you could, without really noticing, drop $100 on quirky home accents and designer T's. Next door stands Boston Beanstock Coffee Co. (97 Salem St., 617-725-0040), a hygienic, Wi-Fied coffeehouse of the Starbucks ilk, but with worthy espresso drinks. Diagonally opposite, alongside the Wild Duck convenience store, is Terramia Ristorante (98 Salem St., 617-523-3112), one of the North End's first practitioners of modern Italian, while its sister Antico Forno (93 Salem St., 617-723-6733) holds the line for marinara. Despite the troops of contractors swarming the block and lifting real estate prices by the minute, there are a few holdouts. Calore Fruit (99 Salem St., 617-227-7157) is a tiny grocery that would comfortably fit into the banana display at a Stop & Shop. Polcari's Coffee (105 Salem St., 617-227-0786), too, is a throwback. It sells bulk legumes and spices, specialty java beans and imported sweets, and is still frequented by elderly ladies in good shoes who can barely see over the countertop.

FITTER, HAPPIER

You're wearing the wrong bra. Don't worry; so was I, before Susan Nethero got her hands on me—literally. As the bra guru and fitter for Intimacy, which opened in December at Copley Place, she told me that an estimated 85 percent of females are wearing the wrong bra whether because of size, style or fit for their shape. That's where Intimacy comes in. "A bra is the most conforming product you wear and also the most personal, so a lot of women are afraid to ask for help but really need to," explains Nethero, who has appeared on TLC's What Not to Wear. Free consultations last about 30 minutes, and bras are custom-altered to your body. The chain store has a range of sizes (A-JJ cup) and styles, including European designers such as La Perla, Lise Charmel and On Gossamer. Trust me, a visit will boost (and amplify) your confidence. Intimacy, Copley Place, Boston (857-277-7887). myintimacy.com.

ASK THE EXPERT

Q: WHAT'S UP WITH MORNING BREATH?

One major cause is cellular death in your mouth. When those cells break down they create sulfur, which causes bad breath. It's a normal cycle, so it's hard to avoid. [Also], reflux can happen because you're lying down. [Oral sprays like] CloSYS II work because they contain chlorine, which bonds with sulfur and eliminates bad breath. Tongue scrapers can help, too. The other secret is hydration—even if that causes you to wake up more during the night.

Well-Stocked Hand New England Soup Factory's Marjorie Druker one of those resealable cartons of commercial chicken broth and she'd probably shudder. Nothing so watery enters Druker's kitchen, let alone the oversized cauldrons in which she simmers her bisques, gumbos, stews and chowders. Instead, she starts with the basics—mostly carrots, onions and whole pieces of poultry—and a few hours later, poof! From the pot she ladles the full-bodied, amber-tinted broth that serves as the backbone to her brews from yellow tomato–jasmine rice to wild mushroom to the locally famous chicken vegetable (she's not kidding about that "triple strength" bit) and, if you grab a quart for yourself, whatever's bubbling on your stove.

TASTY TORO TURNS TWO

Community embraces Ken Oringer's baby

EVOLUTION, OR INTELLIGENT design? Both forces play a role in the success of Ken Oringer's Toro, which celebrated its second anniversary with special guest chefs Katsuya Fukushima of Café Atlántico and Minibar in Washington, D.C., and Rick Billings, pastry chef at Clio.

First, evolution: The roasted chestnut soup with crispy Serrano ham on a recent Toro menu could trace its lineage to a chestnut "cappuccino" Oringer created for Clio back in its early days. As for intelligent design, today's $7 soup is a generous bowlful; the "cappuccino" of yore was a few sips' worth in a demitasse.

"There's a nice yin and yang" between Toro and Clio, Oringer says. At Toro, "I can let my hair down and have fun. It's my baby. I love it. Clio is very special, but a lot of sweating and labor goes into the high end."

Which isn't to say the tapas at Toro are a snap to prepare: The legendary "liquid olives" created by elBulli chef Ferran Adrià—with whom Oringer and Fukushima both worked—have just been added to the menu. At the party Oringer served them tableside in white spoons as he chatted with diners.

"It feels like the community has embraced us," he says. Following the bash, which drew the likes of Ming Tsai, Michael Schlow and Jamie Bissonette, "we kicked 120 people out on the sidewalk at 1:30 am."

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. www.stellaartois.com

DOING GOOD BEADS

Beads That Change the World

USUALLY—AND WHY NOT—we think of jewelry as adornment, fun, even frivolity. And rarely do we know much about the designer, perhaps imagining Park Avenue. BeadforLife.org's charms are different. Their female creators live in dire poverty in Africa, some suffering from HIV themselves or indirectly as widows. Hearteningly, their beads—turned into necklaces, bracelets and earrings—act like powerful airplanes raising them out of their plights. They're constructed from folded magazine pages, lending a faint pentimento of color, subtly twisted in. By selling the jewelry worldwide, partly through bead parties, the women have made colossal advances in significant realms: 22 percent started businesses, 73 percent sent their children to school for the first time, 89 percent increased food intake, 68 percent improved their health. Give a bead party; wear these beautiful adornments; help lift a life. BeadforLife (www.beadforlife.com) supports African women.

CRIMESTOPPER Robert Urich played Spenser in the TV show based on Robert B. Parker's books.

Old Love and New Murders

ROBERT B. PARKER IS at it again, with his 35th Spenser mystery, Now and Then. Given that our favorite Boston P.I. remains haunted by a painful interlude in his romance with psychiatrist Susan Silverman (when she went off with someone else), he's especially receptive to investigating the adultery suspicions of one Dennis Doherty. The love culprit is Perry Alderson, a slick and slimy '60s-style guru with a terrorist agenda. He has a cult-like following among students, whom Parker comically mocks as they spout Perry's slogans like humorless didactic zombies. This guru, with a hidden scheme to manipulate Spenser, seeks therapy with Susan. Spenser snoops and stoops to violence—with the laconic Hawk, hit man Vinnie and an entertainingly dreamy sidekick Chollo—to avenge the murders of Dennis and his cheating wife. It's all chillingly set in the peaceful midnight climes of Cambridge. As always, the ginger between Spenser and Susan is expressed in understated ironic repartee that plays like a quick, tight game of ping-pong. Sexy innuendo travels back and forth at Bogey-and-Bacall–ish speed. Protecting Susan from her "patient," Spenser is lovably gallant.

IN HIS PRIME

Ken Oringer's steakhouse proves he has chops.

KO PRIME'S NAME says it all. Ken Oringer (get it?), a restaurateur to be reckoned with, has delivered Clio, Uni, Toro and La Verdad, drawing dining enthusiasts to indulge in refined continental, upscale sushi, addictive tapas and authentic Mexican. It was only a matter of time before Oringer tackled that quintessential American eatery, the steakhouse. He has done so with flair and finesse, updating the cliche for a more modern clientele.

Take, for example, the assiette de charcuterie ($14)—not your typical steakhouse fare. Served on a long, rectangular tray, this extravaganza included spicy sopressata, duck prosciutto, blood sausage, garlicky salami, rabbit pâté and a second pâté featuring sweet lobster, with a garnish of cauliflower and two types of mustard. It was like a dish from the most distinguished of French delicatessens. Ditto the seared foie gras ($19), which proved irresistible with its savory-sweet flavor and buttery texture. Crispy veal sweetbreads "McNugget style" ($15)—crispy, cinnamon- and apricot-spiked cubes skewered on elongated toothpicks—delighted the whole table, making new fans of offal. KO Prime's shrimp cocktail ceviche ($16), a riff on that old steakhouse standby, brought six colossal, perfectly textured shrimp bathed in a delicious tomato sauce.

Moving to the main event, I confronted a range of steaks, starting with the gargantuan rib-eye chop ($42), a full 30 ounces of well-marbled beef served on the bone. Dubbed the "dinosaur steak" because its size and configuration looked like something out of The Flintstones, the rib eye combined robust flavor and succulent, tender texture. A 10-ounce filet mignon ($43) and 14-ounce New York strip ($39) paled next to the rib eye. More satisfying, and a veritable bargain at $25, was the hanger steak, a generous hunk of beef that seemed larger than its listed 10 ounces. Served with a medallion of bone marrow, a scoop of caramelized onion marmalade and a well-constructed red wine sauce, the steak had a coarse, resilient texture that somehow seemed tender.

Straying beyond the beef main courses, I was surprised but delighted to encounter one of my favorite dishes, cassoulet ($32). As if to reprise the French theme of the charcuterie appetizer, the cassoulet presented the three meaty stars of this classic: rich duck confit, fall-off-the-bone lamb shank and a link of moist garlic sausage. White beans filled the cast-iron casserole to the brim, and although cooked a bit beyond al dente, their pleasantly starchy, deftly spiced flavor nonetheless hit the spot. Roasted chicken ($26) delivered more non-beef enjoyment, with a luxurious accompaniment of buttery spaetzle, mushrooms and foie gras en croute, while the striped bass ($35) justified Oringer's reputation with fish. Its firm, mild-flavored flesh was enhanced by sweet corn, preserved lemon, smoky pancetta and laurel.

Desserts provided a worthy denouement to the good things that preceded them. Fudgy chocolate bread pudding ($10), rich and satisfying, came garnished with pistachio ice cream. A cylinder of frozen mint mousse ($10), with a layer of chocolate on top, had a superb creamy texture and mild sweetness enhanced by the mint. A wedge of tasty carrot cake ($10), redolent of ginger, avoided the cloying sweetness that often afflicts this confection.

KO Prime took over the space formerly occupied by Spire in the boutique Nine Zero Hotel on Tremont Street. Despite cosmetic changes like faux fur and antler chandeliers, its decor felt unremarkable, focusing my attention on the kitchen—helmed by Jamie Bissonnette of Eastern Standard—and the service. I liked the food from the get-go. The service seemed disorganized on my first visit a few months ago, but it showed pronounced improvement more recently, thanks to a vigilant manager's constant surveillance—not an easy task given the dining room's configuration.

While the restaurant fetches some of the highest prices in Boston (consider a three-ounce portion of Japanese Wagyu beef at $90), its menu does provide pocketbook-friendly choices like the hanger steak and chicken. If you want red wine with your beef, however, KO Prime offers little relief. Bottle prices start in the mid-$40s and escalate rapidly, while the cheapest red by the glass ($10) was among the skimpiest pours I've encountered in the city. Of course, cost has never been a reason to stay away from an Oringer production. ✖✖✖

OH SNOW YOU DITN'T!

Nearly six hours in icy gridlock gives me time to ponder a few plans for dealing with winter.

I recently ventured out of the city and drove to Burlington to try "drifting," a spa treatment that promotes yogi-like calm and relaxation (see story on page 38). This proved to be the most ironic journey I've taken in a while, because my quest for tranquility ultimately led to hours of mind-bending stress and seething rage. In fact, just thinking about it right now is making me want to taser a bum. Allow me to explain.

Perhaps you remember the snowstorm we got last month. And perhaps you were out on the roads yourself that day. In that case, I'm sorry to say that I hate your guts, always and forevermore, because you were one of the thousands of people who turned my half-hour drive to Burlington into a five-and-a-half-hour nightmare on the way home. You were one of the people who rushed out of work at 1 pm to beat the traffic, only to contribute to the gridlocked hoard of morons inching along at 0.2 mph. You're the reason my left leg looks like it belongs to Vince Wilfork after depressing the clutch pedal 38,000 times in 20 miles.

Of course, the Great Traffic Jam of '07 wasn't all your fault, fellow drivers. I also owe an extended digit to the cretins who decided not to plow the roads until the storm was over. At one point, about two hours into my trek, I crawled under an overpass on I-95 and saw a fleet of snowplows idling on the road above. There were nine or 10 trucks up there. Sitting. The reason for this, according to reports I heard on the radio, was that it wouldn't make sense to plow before it stopped snowing. Because, dear taxpayers, there's just gonna be more snow, and therefore the act of plowing is Sisyphean in its futility. I see. By that logic, we should stop breathing until we die. After all, what's the point of taking a breath when you're just gonna need another one?

Allow me to put on my old-man pants for a second and declare that I've never seen anything like that day. Traffic was so clogged that letting the car idle in first gear at a walking pace actually seemed like progress. Sometimes when I did this, I also took my hands off the wheel and pretended that my car was KITT and I could just sit there and let him drive me home. Anything to take my mind off the fact that, chronologically, I was looking at the equivalent of a transcontinental flight without going to the bathroom.

Why plow when you can push?

> We're a bunch of babies who don't know how to behave when frozen water falls from the sky.

As I inched my way home, the calm that suffused my body in the wake of my drifting experience slowly gave way to a boiling cauldron of molten rage. Why hadn't the roads been plowed? Why did so many people venture forth in such inappropriate vehicles? And why did everyone decide to leave work early, thus triggering rush hour traffic right in the middle of the heaviest snowfall?

I'm really disappointed with my fellow Massachusettsans. It barely snowed last winter, and it seems that in the interim everyone forgot how to cope with winter. A few years ago, you'd see a news report about Georgia getting two inches of snow and the entire state grinding to a standstill. We'd all laugh and make jokes about inbreeding—or at least, I would. Well, guess what? We're Georgia now. We're a bunch of incompetent babies who don't know how to behave when frozen water falls from the sky. As I witnessed firsthand, we're a state full of people who say, "We're supposed to get eight inches of snow today—I think I'll drive the Porsche."

During my five and a half hours in the car, I developed some ideas for winter transportation reform. For instance, there should be checkpoints before people are allowed on the highway. Motorists attempting to get on I-95 in a rear-wheel-drive sports car with summer tires will be directed instead to a waiting area, where they'll be dragged from their vehicle and beaten with a shovel. Likewise, any administrator who decrees, "Let's wait until the storm's over, so we only have to plow once," will be hog-tied naked to the hood of a plow truck until it's driven from Logan Airport to the New York border. And meteorologists who A) act excited about the snow, or B) use panic-inciting terminology, such as

WELCOME TO WINTER Turn your radios to NPR and prepare for a hellish ride.

"whopper" and "Nor'easter," will be immediately transferred to an affiliate station in Nome, Alaska, where they'll be hog-tied naked to a snowplow and beaten with a shovel. I'm sorry, Pete Bouchard. You seem like a nice enough guy, but rules are rules.

And with that, maybe we can take a step or two back toward becoming the hearty New Englanders of the beloved stereotype—the ones who'd shake a fist at the sky and head out to sea never to be seen again. The ones who'd get to their appointment at the witch-stoning regardless of a blizzard or a case of dysentery. The ones who think the concept of wind chill is a scam perpetrated by the Communists to undermine our society. Those are my people. This wimpiness about winter is a recent development, and I don't like it.

I have cause to be optimistic, though. Last year, during the one brief snowstorm that hit the city, I heard a distinctive, beautiful sound outside my window, one that was familiar from winters growing up in Maine. It was a snowmobile, bombing down the streets of Southie. I couldn't believe it—not only does someone keep a Ski-Doo Mach 1 in town, but this rebellious visionary was riding it on public roads and defying anyone to come out in the cold and stop him. Of course, nobody bothered him. Are you kidding? It was a whopper out there. ***

TRAVEL IN 2008

Hit the road and experience globalization.

Get out of your shell!

I HOPE THAT ONE of your resolutions for the new year is to travel. Aside from the sense of wonder and adventure it provides, there are selfish reasons for taking trips. And the selfish reasons involve your money. We live in a very small world today, and the only way to understand globalization is to experience it.

Recently, my wife and I were in Scotland (not playing golf, just wandering around). I last visited 20 years ago, starting in Edinburgh, sightseeing and searching for any restaurant that didn't serve haggis, a dish Rob Roy lusted for but is lost on me. Scotland was a somewhat buttoned-up home for trust funds run by aristocratic managers, or lords of money who would also shoot small birds for dinner. This time we discovered a city that doesn't sleep much, multistar restaurants and music clubs packed to the gunwales with young people going for the gold.

Later, in the Highlands near Aberdeen, we went to a country restaurant. There was parking for about a dozen cars. Ten of them were new BMWs, big ones, 700 series. Two decades ago, minicars puttered along the highways, somber tartan hues colored the clothing. Today peacocks and upward mobility rule.

Back in Edinburgh, we made a pilgrimage to the gravesite of Adam Smith, the father of modern economics. A bright, plastic Hawaiian lei was draped over the memorial in celebration, I suppose, of free markets and competition. Let the international good times roll.

The naysayers throughout history heap curses upon major changes in their early stages: the automobile, the radio, the personal computer. You get the picture. Globalization developed partially because of psychological reasons. The Berlin Wall, in my opinion, came down because of television. When people get a glimpse of better living conditions and consumer goods there for the taking, they want in. It's human nature. Expanding this theme, in Vienna several years ago, I observed thousands of shoppers, pushing prams on the wide boulevards, eager to socialize and spend money on a sunny Saturday. Now that CNN broadcasts such scenes worldwide, millions can see what results from hard work in a free environment.

Travel in this country is an eye-opener as well. Too often we assume that attitudes in the media, and particularly in the Northeast, pervade the rest of the United States. A few years ago I mentioned to a client that dozens of different Americas exist in this country, not just New York, Massachusetts and Hollywood. He responded, "Anything not on the two coasts in the USA is worthless." I told him that was the stupidest thing I'd ever heard. More recently, I had a potential new client call me from Missouri. He's a farmer, the fourth generation working the same land. He seemed surprised that I was so pleased to speak with him. "Why?" I said. "Because I'm a city slicker?" He laughed, a good sign.

I learn from my clients and friends. They often give me my best ideas, and the more diverse their backgrounds and locations, the more I discover about trends and different ways to think about the future. Agriculture is a huge global theme as food demand perks up everywhere. Who wouldn't want a Midwest farmer for a client?

On a quick jaunt to London in the fall, I had the sobering experience of witnessing what the falling U.S. dollar means in the cost of everything abroad. Ouch. Maybe they can bring back George III and annex us. Claridge's Hotel in Mayfair provides prime people watching of the wealthy order. Having a nightcap in the bar, we spotted a younger woman on the lap of an older man in black tie, seriously kissing. Knowing this was the natural order, we retired for the night. At 4 am, fire alarms awoke the hotel and 300 people streamed into the chilly streets, most in PJs, bathrobes and slippers. I saw movie stars, Saudi potentates, CEOs, venture capitalists—all basically naked and somewhat scared, dealing with their mortality. We stood next to Dominick Dunne, the great social commentator for Vanity Fair, looking small in his nightclothes. What was his comment on the humbling nature of fires in the night? "I can't believe I left my glasses in the room."

We're all equal when we meet our maker. Have a healthy year. ✖✖✖

ON WORLD SERIES BALLS, BAD ACTING, "FIRE ISIAH" AND THE NFL PLAYOFFS

3 Crossover Stars

The Boston Three Party... Drew Bledsoe plowing over a mascot in the ESPN hallways is still our favorite "This is Sportscenter" moment, but Pierce, KG and Ray do the homeland proud in their new spot. How about this question, though: How many of the Big Three do you think have actually seen The Three Amigos? We guess only one. Probably Ray Allen.

15 Yards for Bad Acting... Honestly, after 112 receptions (and posing for our cover) Wes Welker can do whatever the hell he wants, but his new commercial for Bob's Discount Furniture is, in a word, awkward.

I'm John McCain, and I Approve This Ridiculousness... What's the more disturbing aspect of Curt Schilling's television campaign for McCain: that Schil really thinks his opinion might influence someone else's vote, or that there's a good chance he's right?

VOTE FOR POSEY

He might not have the numbers of a Leandro Barbosa or Manu Ginobli, but when it comes to sixth men in the NBA, no one's had a greater impact on his team's overall success than James Posey. In the locker room he's the anti-Ricky Davis (and then some), and on the court he'll come off the bench to take a charge or hit a big three. He just might send Tommy Heinsohn into a Tommy Point-induced coma before the season's done.

2 LUCKY SEVENS

And All With a Bum Shoulder With the 2007 regular season wrapped up, it's now been seven years since Tom Brady missed a game for New England (125 games—including playoffs—and counting). It's sad that in seven years we only get to see 125 games of Brady, yet last season alone had to endure 140 of JD Drew.

We're Going Streaking! With their Jan. 1 win against the Rockets, the Celtics earned their third separate seven-game win streak of the season... and they were only 30 games in. There's no better representation of the level of dominance the C's have exhibited so far.

5 QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Can the Celtics win out West?
So maybe they haven't played in San Antonio or Phoenix yet, but that recent 4-0 road trip speaks for itself. The defining game was against the Lakers. The C's had played a tough one in Utah the night before and could've easily rolled over for a respectable 3-1 trip. Instead, they put together an inspired performance that was beautiful to watch—even at the risk of seeing Andrew Bynum's bag slip out the bottom of his short shorts.

Can the Pats run?
It's completely ridiculous that this question is still being asked. Do you really think that Bill Belichick—a man who knows more about playoff football than Kiefer Sutherland does about Breathalyzer tests—would put together a team not built for the postseason? Not only is Maroney a monster, but last time we checked, the Patriots had three offensive linemen going to the Pro Bowl.

Is Lamar Odom the new Kurt Rambis?
Hopefully. As infuriating as Odom's cheap shot on Ray Allen was, it's undeniably great to see teams giving a shit about the Celtics again. It's only January and you can already envision the budding rivalries (Detroit, Orlando, L.A.). And if it's this intense now, the playoffs are going to be a mess. Better have some bear tranquilizer ready for when Rasheed Wallace pisses KG off in the conference finals.

Who can beat New England?
Other than the obvious answer (Indy), Dallas is the only possibility. They already proved they could hang with the Pats (even if it was just for three quarters), and they've got an explosive offense and the kind of playmakers on D that can turn a game in a one-and-done format.

Did Boss really eat it?
So Jonathan Papelbon says his bulldog ate the 2007 World Series ball that Varitek gave him after Game 4. We think he's lying. That's not to say he's secretly hoarding it in a safe somewhere; it's just more likely he left it on top of his car at a gas station or next to one of the urinals at the Hooters in Jacksonville.

4 DATES TO WATCH

1/10 Starting tonight with the Canadiens, the Bruins play six of their next seven games against teams that sit above them in the Eastern Conference. Time for the B's to step up, or they'll find themselves in a familiar spot: out of playoff contention.

1/12 16-0 couldn't be less significant as the Patriots host either the Steelers, Jaguars or Titans in round two of the playoffs. The team won't look past any of these opponents, but we can't help it. Bring on the Colts.

1/19 It's Junior Seau's 39th birthday. Back in 1969—when Junior was born—the Pats were known as the Boston Patriots and played their home games at BC's Alumni Stadium. On the other hand, Mercury Morris was already an asshole.

1/21 The Celtics travel to New York for an MLK Day matchup against the Knicks. How bad have things gotten in the Big Apple? We have a college friend from New York who's been strategically grooming his body hair for the last month so he can shave "Fire Isiah" on his chest and parade shirtless around the Garden.

ZAGAT BOSTON 2001

"I didn't actually have a mulle in the New Kids days. It was a ponytail, and it just looked lik a mullet when I took the rubber band out."

Soroff On DONNIE WAHLBERG

The New Kids' bad boy is Mr. Nice now. Just don't call him Edmond.

Born and raised in Dorchester, Donnie Wahlberg first rose to stardom as a member of New Kids on the Block. Now 38, Wahlberg has established himself as a presence in Hollywood, with film and TV appearances in Ransom, The Sixth Sense, Southie, Band of Brothers, Boomtown and Big Apple. He's currently at work filming a movie in Boston (Real Men Cry, costarring Ethan Hawke), and although he maintains a home in the area, he lives mostly in Los Angeles with his wife, Kim, and their two sons, Xavier and Elijah.

Jonathan Soroff: When did you first realize you were a teen idol?
Donnie Wahlberg: [Chuckles.] When my high school girlfriend who had just dumped me was begging me to come back.

Weirdest part of the whole New Kids experience?
Going from one tour bus with all of us on it together, to five separate tour buses. We didn't talk to each other for the whole tour, although we did patch it up later.

Is the story about you throwing a Molotov cocktail true or false?
That I lit a hotel room on fire? That's false, but for all the shit I got in, I wish I did. There was no fire. Not even two sticks rubbed together. When you watch TV and see someone getting charged with something, the average person goes, "Man, that guy is crazy." Me? I sit there and go, "Wow. I wonder what really happened." I was charged with first-degree arson, the most extreme charge, and there was not even a spark. So go figure that one out.

Is New Kids embarrassing to you?
I like to have it both ways. There are moments that I'm very proud of, and if I had my way, I'd just show those moments to everyone. But there is an equal amount of horrific moments that make me want to crawl under a rock, and I can't edit the past, so I just gotta suck it up.

You got so famous at such a young age. Did that f you up in some sense?
Well, compared to most people who get famous at a young age, I'd have to say no. But I find myself discovering ways in which it fed me up all the time. Like I refuse to wash a dish, and that's not cool. But y'know what? I'm not gonna do it. I used to wear it as a badge of honor, but now, at age 38, I'm beginning to acknowledge it as a bit of a flaw.

Any advice for a teen idol today?
No. I have none because I didn't want to hear anyone's when I was one. Donnie Osmond was always trying to give us advice, usually sarcastic, but it was bitter. I don't want to be that way with some young kid.

What if one of your kids said, "I want to start a band"—would you want him to?
Financially, I would hate it, because the record business isn't much of a business anymore; there's not a lot of money to be made. That said, my 14-year-old son plays bass in a death-metal band, so at least he won't be known as a goodie two-shoes.

How do you sustain a long career?
I use my brother Mark's method: Keep bulling forward before someone realizes it's all smoke and mirrors.

Is it luck or talent?
I forget the exact saying but it's something I subscribe to: Luck is when preparation meets opportunity. But the real answer is that there's no way you can work consistently in Hollywood without a lot of luck, but at the same time you can't do it unless you're pretty good at what you're doing.

If I'd told you as a kid where you'd be today, what would you have said?
I would have most humbly agreed with you.

Most awkward image of yourself from back then?
I've been debating this for years, but I didn't actually have a mullet in the New Kids days. It was a ponytail, and it just looked like a mullet when I took the rubber band out. But I can't win that debate with anyone. It's a tough one to swallow.

How much do you care about your appearance?
I care about not seeming like I care about my appearance.

Strangest piercing?
Besides my piercing voice when I sing on old New Kids records? I'd say my left nipple.

Is Mark's penis really as big as in Boogie Nights*?*
[Laughs.] I was actually the stunt double for him in that movie.

Who's the best actor in your family: you, Mark, Bob...
Hmm. I think me, because I not only act like an actor but I acted like a singer for a good 10 years, too. Although I guess it's a tie with Mark, 'cause he acted like a rapper, but we both pulled it off.

Forehead wrinkles: to Botox or not to Botox?
Not to Botox. Though I've got enough forehead wrinkles that I should probably give it a try.

What are you most proud of, either professionally or personally?
In my career, the thing I'm most proud of is my perseverance. In my personal life, it would be my generosity.

Career you see yourself having in 10 years?
Fisherman. I could be retired, sitting on a pond somewhere, catching fish.

Is there a country where you're more famous than the United States?
I'm more famous in South Boston, which is its own country.

Speaking of Boston actors, aren't you sick of working with Neal McDonough?
Yes, I am. [Laughs.] But I'm not sick of hanging out with him.

Your middle name is Edmond. What's up with that?
Why do you have to tell everyone?

Last question: What's the likelihood of a New Kids reunion?
The likelihood of a well-done, extremely tasteful, very classy reunion? Better than 50 percent. But if it's a cheesebag nostalgia tour? Zero percent. ✖✖✖

ALL IN THE ENLIGHTENED FAMILY

North End Yoga brings a new tradition to Little Italy

By Nick Altschuller
Photographs by Jörg Meyer

YOU KNOW how the story goes. "It was just one of those 'Oh my God, I'm so sick of my job' moments," says 29-year-old Alicia Orr, cofounder of North End Yoga. "I said, 'Why can't I get up and do something I love every day?' And Alessandra said, 'I say the same thing all the time.'"

And so the dietician and former paralegal leased an expansive studio overlooking Hanover Street. Joined by two other rat racers–turned-teachers—a television producer and a financial analyst—Orr and cofounder Alessandra Miele opened North End Yoga in August, bringing the Hindu practice to the city's Italian epicenter for the first time.

"Boston has been exposed to yoga before, but there were a lot of people in this neighborhood that were curious and hadn't tried it until we were around the corner," says 28-year-old Miele, a native Italian. "Now we're the yogis in the neighborhood. That's how everyone sees us."

Such a strong sense of identity is definitively North End. It's also what may help this cultural outlier take root in a neighborhood that holds tightly to tradition. Orr and Miele's venture is as much about spreading yoga as it is about staying connected to the tight community where they live.

"We did meet working in a local restaurant," Miele says. "It's just, you live in a building, the landlord is the person who lives on the first floor, you get a part-time job in the restaurant, the owner of the restaurant owns the building, and he's cousins with the guy across the street, and if you pay attention, if you're friendly to people, you just get to know them, really like a family."

"Now we're the yogis in the neighborhood," says Miele.

Orr and Miele met at Strega, where Miele stills tends bar part-time. They'd like to get the men of Strega in for a class. "As long as they get a buffet," jokes owner Nick Varano. "I'm not really your yoga-type person. Just seeing some of the poses. Madonna Mia! It's tough."

Having grown up around the corner, Varano has watched the neighborhood evolve. With a businessman's eye, he sees a place for North End Yoga in its future. "That's how diverse the North End is," Varano observes. "It's changing now. You can spend the whole day in the North End. There's so many condos going up and so many different people coming in."

North End Yoga is more than a mere symbol of transformation, though. It's also a reminder that change can be made with respect to the past. Yoga is a practice that preaches connectivity, and with a $100 bill from Varano tacked over the door, Orr and Miele hope to spread that idea on one of Boston's busiest streets.

"You see there's a more peaceful way to be," Orr says.

Adds Miele, "And I think it helps you discover yourself and be less afraid of change." ***

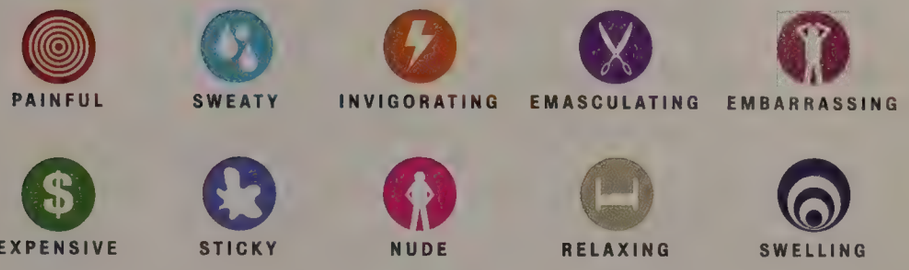
To better describe each treatment, we've picked from the following symbols. "Bodily fluid" isn't as bad as it sounds.



Boston Adventures in Extreme Beauty

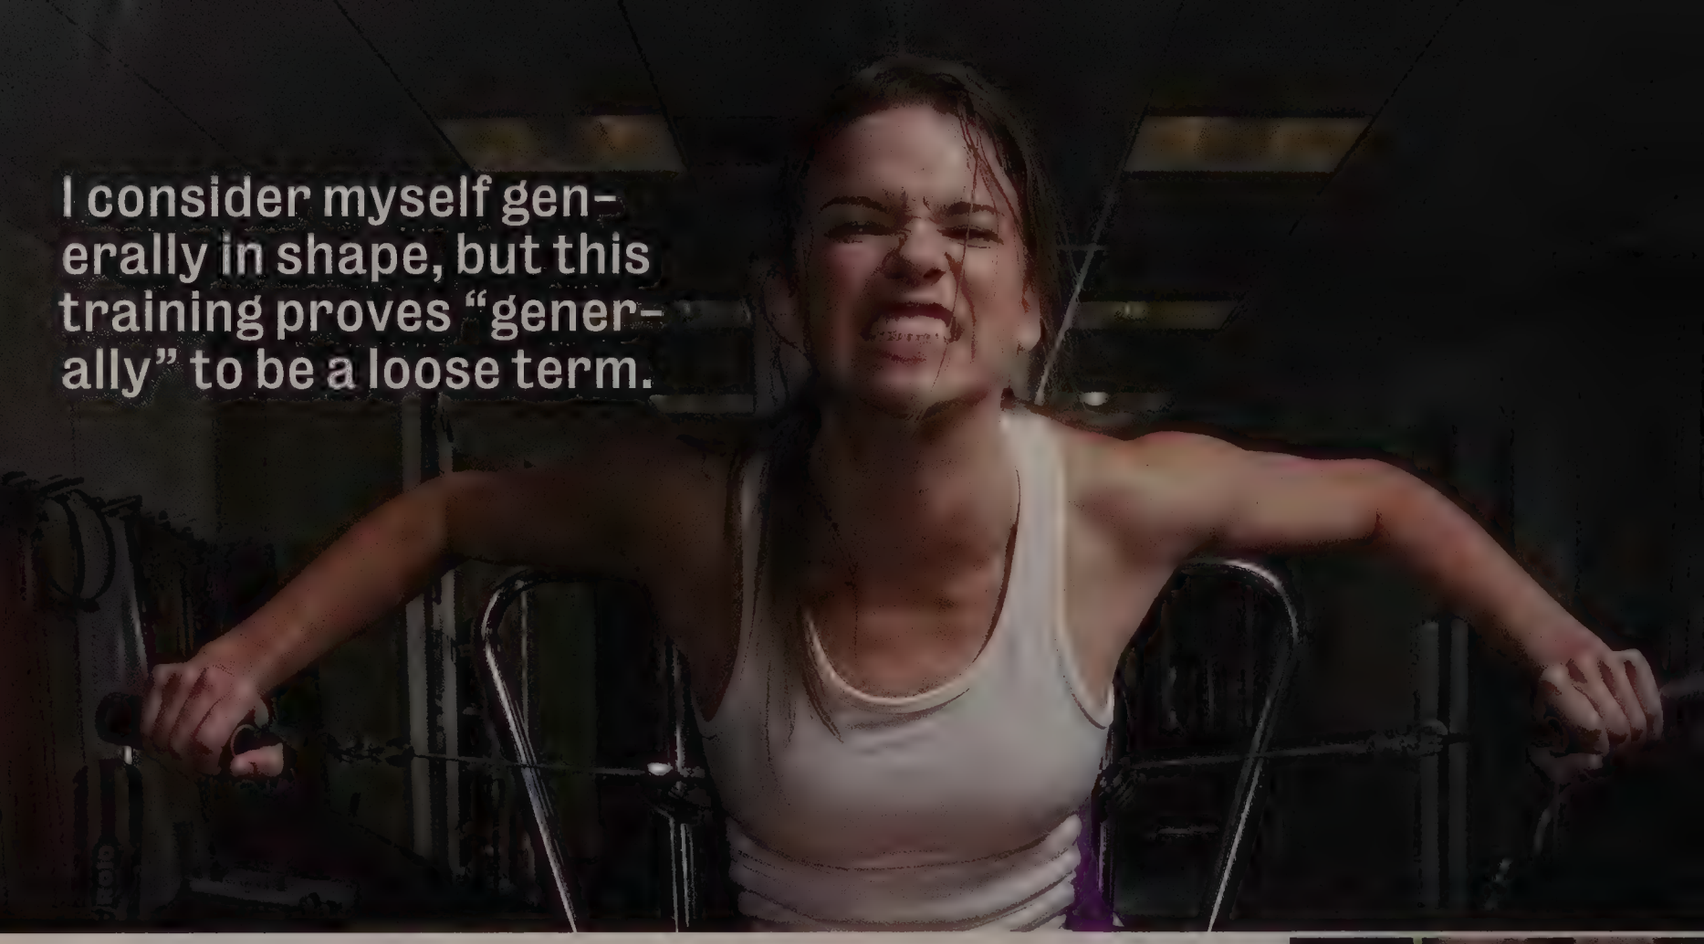
Spa and Fitness Services That Leave You Feeling Weird All Over

BY THE IMPROPER'S EDITORIAL STAFF PHOTOGRAPHS BY TRACY POWELL

When our reporter returns to the office, he looks like he lost a fight with an outsize cigarette lighter. Bruises form crop circles under his shirt. That's what happens when you visit the spa. At least that's what happens when you have cupping, which uses heat or suction to create a partial vacuum with the skin. The procedure stimulates the flow of blood, lymph and energy. It also leaves back hickeys that last a week.

Anything in the name of health and beauty these days. The wellness industry keeps raising the stakes with innovative offerings, and Boston has embraced the trend. Why nap, really, when you can have floatation therapy? To test the waters, we picked seven of the city's stranger services—the more extreme, the better. Treatments included platza, candling and power body detox, which mixes mud with electricity. We also threw in a fitness gauntlet for the exercise nuts.

It wasn't pretty. Aside from the bruises, there was pain and embarrassment. One of us has already repressed the memory of a "wet oak" massage. We did feel healthier on the whole, however. Read our first-hand accounts and then try a treatment. Because if you're just getting facials, you're not living. Talk to us once you've had Swiss lymphatic drainage.



I consider myself generally in shape, but this training proves "generally" to be a loose term.

I'm Just a Girl

I'm about to get an "ass-kicking." Those were the words my trainer, Jess, used to describe the "fitness gauntlet" she put together for this issue. And before you go thinking that taking a hard-core exercise class five days in a row is ridiculous (it is), consider this: There are actual women in Boston who pay for this sort of weekly torture at Healthworks, my gym in the Back Bay.

I, on the other hand, normally meet with Jess on Thursdays with a friend. For me, it's as much a social as a sweating experience. So the first morning of the gauntlet is a rude awakening. Let's take a moment to appreciate my outfit: pajamas plus a sports bra. I consider myself generally in shape, but this Results training proves "generally" to be a very loose term. At the end, I find myself pathetically dangling from a pull-up bar.

Tuesday it's on to Gravity, a class I've spent the past year ridiculing. Girls exercising in unison, as Gwen Stefani blares in the background, make an easy target. My teacher, Alaina, arranges the machine for me, explaining that the slanted glideboard has eight settings (think Chuck Norris and the Total Gym). "Eight is the hardest. We'll start you there." I'm not laughing now.

Nor am I laughing the next morning. I'm in serious pain and swear never to make fun of Gravity again. Thankfully, I have Pilates with Nadja, a former dancer who gently guides me through the movements. I learn about breathing during exercise (obviously important) and pelvic placement (surprisingly important). Next it's Extend with Helena, which involves lying on a massage table while being stretched in the cardio room. Awkward? Yes. Relaxing? Hell, yes.

Thursday, I finally get to kick some ass. Ryan, my tattooed kickboxing instructor, breaks it down: "People like to hit things." Turns out, I'm one of these people. After teaching me the basic punches and kicks, he lets me go. I'm like Rocky. Well, Rocky with an opponent who high-fives me. Still, I'm reinvigorated.

There are women who pay for this torture.

Until I wake up for my last session, which meets at 6 am. That's just not right. My mood improves slightly when my teacher, Tara, gives me headphones. If I've learned one thing, it's the power of music. I'm exhausted by this point in the gauntlet, but to be honest Burn—a group class that combines treadmill intervals and strength training—would be tough regardless.

At the end of the week, I do feel more in shape. I'm also slightly off-kilter. I'd recommend incorporating a couple of these types of classes into your routine. Using a trainer does have huge benefits, even if it hurts. And involves Gwen Stefani.

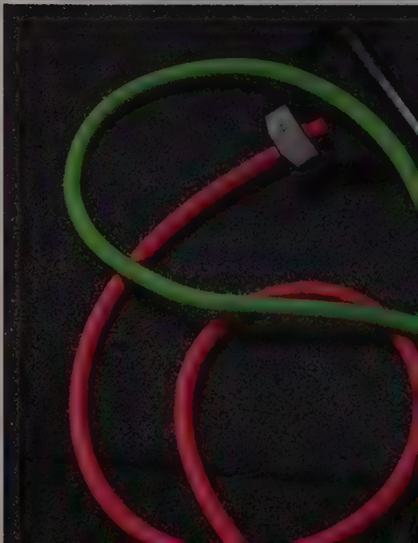
GRUNT AND BEAR IT A five-day "fitness gauntlet" is a genuine ass-kicking.



BUBBLE BOY These cups create a vacuum with the skin—and leave some serious bruises.

Our Cup of Tea

When my editor first asked me to get "cupping" for this story, my initial reaction was, "Wait, I thought Nick was the one having something weird done to his balls." But thankfully, that's not what cupping is about, or so I'd learn during a visit to Mary Kinneavy's office.

Mary is a licensed acupuncturist at Pathways to Wellness—a nonprofit in the South End—who's practiced in Boston for more than 20 years. And while acupuncture is her forte, she also dabbles in other forms of holistic help. Cupping is one of these forms. It's an ancient Chinese deep-tissue massage, in which a partial vacuum is created by cups placed on the skin and suction. The process stimulates the flow of blood, lymph and energy to the affected spot. "It can reach a larger area than many treatments," she tells me, "and it's great for tight muscles and circulation problems." Sounds good. Let's give it a try.

I start out lying face-down and shirtless on Mary's table. Four medium-sized cups are suctioned to my back, and a smaller fifth one is attached to my neck. It sort of feels like four largemouth bass (and one normal-mouth bass) are simultaneously giving me hickeys. So in other words, it feels pretty awesome. Mary supplies a more technical description. "The suction brings all the toxins in your body to the surface, and then they can be dealt with."

After about five minutes, the cups are removed and stage two begins—with eight words I haven't heard in a long time: "I'm going to slather Vaseline all over you." Once I'm sufficiently lubed, Mary attaches another cup, but this time she's able to glide it without losing the grip. The cup holds its suction tightly as it moves around the surface of my back and neck; I'd equate it to a good massage.

It feels like four largemouth bass (and one normal-mouth bass) are simultaneously giving me hickeys. So in other words, it feels pretty awesome.

The appointment's over and aside from a few impressive yet painless bruises, I'm no worse for the wear. But am I any better? That's hard to say. I don't think cupping's about the quick fix, but more of a procedure that can teach your body how to improve over the long haul. I'll definitely do it again.

Sticks and Bones

In the movies, Russian baths are where men go to relax and talk about women and crime until a fight breaks outs and someone gets stabbed. It all seems very macho. This notion ends the second a nude septuagenarian stamps my bare package with a shrub. Dillons Russian Steam Bath is tiny, traditional and a whole lotta naked. Open since 1885, the signature treatment is the platza (plate-suh), the Yiddish word for shoulders and my new prompt to find a happy place.

Platzas occur in the sauna, where the damp heat slowly eases my tension and fear of public nudity. A wooden bench in the corner is manned by Patsy, an older gent who by some devilish twist of irony has spent a large percentage of his life disrobed and sweaty. Patsy directs me to lie face down with my feet and head propped up by sponge pillows. After slapping a Gilligan hat on my head to protect my eyes, he begins the most socially awkward rubdown of my young life. Back and forth go his forearms and hands, spreading a warm soapy mixture. I bury my face in the pillow and try to imagine that it's just disembodied hands massaging me, like Thing from The Addams Family. But my concentration breaks with each gruff call to relax, something difficult to do when someone swipes their fingertips through your butt crack.

The next step is a scrubbing with two bundles of wet oak leaves—ostensibly, giant organic loofahs. Wielding them like pom-poms, Patsy glides, whirls and taps them from my neck to my toes, answering my childhood question of what walking through a car wash would feel like. By the time I get the dreaded call to flip over, I'm sedate to the point that old men drinking beer and watching me bathe no longer seems worrisome. When the last bucket of water sloshes over my head and washes away my snowman's suit of white foam, I stand energized and proud as Adam pre-apple.

In the lounge we relax in towels. Patsy gives betting advice ("The Seahawks are the dark horse"). He shares wisdom on women ("They'll take everything you've got until you have nothing, and then they go somewhere else"). Men talk about jobs they've pulled, and words of profanity, vulgarity and blasphemy cloud the air like steam. Leaning back to down a beer after an hour of sweat, I feel content, clean and manly.

Pain in the Butt

Getting a power body detox sounds extremely refreshing. Until I read the description on Exhale's Web site; the phrase "targeted electrical stimulation" definitely freaks me out. Thankfully, I'm greeted by the lovely Leila, who puts my mind at ease—so much so that I immediately sign my life away via a release form. Leila explains that the therapy uses Ionithermie technology, where two forms of electric stimulation flow through the body, which is covered in conductive clay. The procedure is designed to shed immediate inches, break down fat deposits, tone and firm muscles, reduce cellulite, and boost circulation and lymphatic drainage. Clients who want to avoid cosmetic surgery are big fans and usually go back for many sessions. I opt for a one-time hip and thigh treatment.

Disappointed in my slim frame, Leila tells me I probably won't see significant results but measures me for fun anyway. Images of Tara Reid pop into my mind. The first part of the detox feels relaxing, as she applies a "slimming cocktail" to my legs, full of anti-inflammatory vitamins, detoxifying oils and amino acid–based firming cream. The second part isn't nearly as pleasant. The shocks force my leg muscles to contract involuntarily, and I concentrate on my breathing. This lasts about half an hour; by the 28th minute I start getting used to the sensation.

Afterward Leila explains that the process flushes everything back into the lymphatic system, which makes it easier to leave your body. (Translation: I'm about to pee like a racehorse.) Next she busts out the measuring tape and, to my surprise, I'm half an inch thinner around each thigh. No joke. Still not convinced that drinking a bottle of water didn't put that half inch back, I measure myself again a week later and find Leila's magic intact. It may not be the most enjoyable experience, but it sure beats lypo.

The Russian bath seems very macho. This notion ends the second a nude septuagenarian stamps my bare package with a shrub.

Oh Buoy!

I step through the door into my treatment room at Driftaway Floatation Spas and dip my toe into a pool of warm, silky water. This rectangular space, suffused with cool indigo light and filled with 10 inches of super-salty H_2O, will be my personal relaxation haven for the next 50 minutes. That is, assuming I can harness the therapeutic power of floating to transcend my prosaic hang-ups about floating.

First of all, I'm buck naked, and the germaphobe in me is concerned about lowering my nakedness into this bath. And I hate having my ears underwater. But I tell myself that the pool is filtered four times after every session, and besides, not much can live in water that's saturated with 1,000 pounds of Epsom salt. And my ears are protected by gel earplugs, which everyone is required to wear.

Indeed, it's bizarrely appealing to be released from the shackles of gravity.

So, personal neuroses quelled, I take the plunge. The idea behind floating is that the experience of weightlessness promotes the sort of mental release that would normally require practiced meditation, and indeed, it's bizarrely appealing to be released from the shackles of gravity. But it's hard to stop thinking, and I'm reminded of the scene in Ghostbusters where Ray tries to clear his mind and instead imagines the Stay-Puft Marshmallow Man, with disastrous consequences.

Yet at one point, maybe 10 minutes into the session, I notice that I can't really tell where my skin ends and the water begins, the warm solution instigating a sort of out-of-body experience. Unfortunately, the fact that I notice this snaps me out of it, like when you realize you're falling asleep and you suddenly twitch yourself awake.

Fifty minutes slide by surprisingly fast, and when I step out into the shower room I feel more relaxed than I have after any massage of my life. I have Gumby-limbs, like I've taken some kind of drug. On my way out, I buy a pass to return—a permission slip telling me that some day in the future, I'll have 50 minutes when it's OK to do absolutely nothing.

Wax On, Wax Off

It's hard to imagine a spa treatment more closely resembling a medieval torture than ear candling. The idea of sticking a muslin and beeswax tube into your ear and then setting it on fire sounds like something Torquemada might have dreamt up in one of his more sadistic moments. But truth be told, it's as soothing as a mud wrap and far less painful than having someone squeeze your blackheads. (Let's not even discuss waxing.)

With candling, the goal is to draw out built-up gunk. While my ears aren't particularly grimy, it does bug me that my only means of cleaning them is poking around with a bit of cotton on the end of a cardboard stick. That one spa treatment might render my ears spotlessly clean holds definite appeal, so I arrive at g2o only slightly on edge (and that's probably because I've forgotten to take my Klonopin that morning).

After all the usual spa stuff (herbal tea, cushy sofa, New Age music and getting led down a hallway to a dimly lit room), I'm lain on my side and draped with towels. A paper cuff (similar to the ones people put around dogs' necks) protects my face from the candle, which is inserted in my ear and set aflame. For the next 15 minutes, it burns with a soft hiss, and the aesthetician occasionally cuts away the ash. I feel practically nothing, save for a bit of warmth toward the end, although I look like a Dadaist birthday cake when I ask the aesthetician to hold up a mirror.

When it's done, he cuts open the two tubes to show me what was extracted: From one ear, only a bit of fluid, but from the other there's a large wad of brown wax that elicits a well-deserved "Eeeeew!" My final impression: At $65 a session, candling is a bit self-indulgent. But it's more fun than a Q-Tip.

JOY SUCK CLUB Performed with a metal wand tipped by a suction cup, Swiss lymphatic drainage is painless and quite relaxing.

Swissed Off

Lymph. It's one of those bodily fluids we don't often glimpse in our bathroom tissue, so it tends to get snubbed. I, for one, wouldn't know lymph if it came frothed in an oversize mug with a dusting of cocoa and cinnamon, but my eighth-grade biology teacher said we're awash in the stuff. It's slithering around our cells, carting bits of fat and funneling useless fluid into our nodes. In some mysterious way, it's probably important. So a procedure that drains it out of your face, however "noninvasive," sounds dubious. The scene at the end of Raiders of the Lost Ark springs to mind.

Antoniette, the aesthetician performing the treatment, installs me in a private room filled with spiritual oddments, whiffs of spice, calming music and a machine that looks like the navigational system off a World War II destroyer. I lie on a massage table while she rubs my scalp and face with the first of a slew of scented oils. It's minty, making me feel like a piece of spring lamb being prepped for the oven. Then she gives me an algae mask and my masculinity curls up into a tiny ball, rocking on its heels and cooing beer jingles.

Next comes the machine, which has a pair of penlights that swivel out to shine "pure monochromatic light" onto my chakras. I've never noticed my chakras before. I watch as my solar plexus is bathed in blue and hope it enjoys itself. The actual drainage is performed with a little metal wand tipped by a suction cup. Antoniette runs it over my neck and face, intending to stimulate the flow of lymph, which is then supposed to excrete toxins through my pores. It's pleasant, in the way that getting gentle, nibbling kisses from a robot is pleasant. Afterwards, I have a mud facial and a nap.

I'm steeped in an odor of peppermint and roses, like a 19th-century courtesan.

The overall effect is languid and relaxing, although I don't notice any lymph leaking from my clavicles. My face is burnished and smooth, like a waxed apple, and I'm steeped in an odor of peppermint and roses, like a 19th-century courtesan. For the money, I could have washed my face with lye soap, herbal tea and vegetable oil, and then pocketed the change. Still, it saves me from having to restock my pantry.

POPS GOT STYLE

Felino Samson makes cooking look good.

After hearing that Pops, as in the South End restaurant, referred to owner Felino Samson's nickname, some stereotypes came to mind. "Stylish" and "well-groomed" weren't among them. Yet Samson embodies both of these qualities. As it happens, he worked in fashion before pursuing his culinary career. And although his designing days are over, he still looks the part. Just check out his chef pants. They're seersucker.

By Amanda Knorr Photographs by Alan Gwizdowski

Improper Bostonian: How would you describe your personal style?
Felino Samson: I think once you mature you tend to become more classic with how you dress. Earlier, when I was in fashion, I tended to dress a little more fashion-forward. Now that I'm in a field that's a little more casual, I dress as a function of my work. I'm tired of the pretty-boy look. That's not really in style anymore. Men need an edge, a rough side. And I think women tend to resent a boy who's too pretty.

What's your fashion background?
I designed women's sportswear for about 12 years. I started out as an illustrator and hopped around the bigger labels. When I did get my own division, it was at a small, private label. I also designed a little bit for myself, for fun. [Including the vest he's wearing on the shoot.]

Do you ever miss designing?
That lifestyle is so hard. People say working in a restaurant [takes] long, hard hours, but if you're a fashion designer you have to be obsessed 24 hours. When you're a chef, you finish your last plate, you get home and go to sleep.

How did you make the transition from fashion to food?
At the height of it all, I got fed up. You just walk off and the next day you figure it out. My résumé had no cooking experience. I dropped it off at all the three- and four-star restaurants in the city and wrote on the back, "Give me a chance," and someone did.

So what do you wear in the kitchen?
It's a pretty standard uniform these days. I don't do traditional chef whites. I do seersucker, short sleeves from French designer Bragard and my pinstripes.

How many pairs of chef pants do you go through?
A lot. A couple dozen a year.

How does Pops' location reflect your style?
I lived in the South End for 10 years. To me, it's my 'hood. It's what I'm used to. I know the people here, and I know the needs of the community here. The South End has always been known for its distinctive style.

"Men need an edge, a rough side. Women tend to resent a boy who's too pretty."

What's your standard look?
Now it's jeans and a good-fitting shirt. Fashion has slimmed to more of a street look. And street fashion is about fit. If you're a person who wants to make a statement, it's less about labels and more about how you fit in your clothes.

What are the essentials in a guy's wardrobe?
For a man, it's the belt, shoes and a great watch. ✖✖✖

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Atonement ★★★ Director Joe Wright, who helmed 2005's rollicking, dynamic take on Pride and Prejudice, reteams with Keira Knightley, this time to tackle Ian McEwan's epic WWII downer. The first hour suggests we might be in for a masterpiece, as cinematographer Seamus McGarvey's camera restlessly prowls through the English country estate where Knightley's poor little rich girl pines for James McAvoy's hapless gardener. Class resentments simmer; sexual tensions sizzle; and a few tragic misunderstandings hurtle things headlong into disaster. Then along comes that pesky war, and Christopher Hampton's screenplay switches gears into more abstract, literary territory, and these vibrant flesh-and-blood characters recede into symbols. Wright desperately tries to hold our attention with an array of visual trickery, but even a breathtakingly staged, unbroken steadicam shot, winding its way around thousands of extras at the Dunkirk evacuation, can't touch the close-quartered intimacy of those early reels. The final kicker is a purely literary flourish, one that connects in the head but not the heart. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Bee Movie ★½ Those sobering statistics about disappearing bees may have something to do with climate change. Or it could be that our fuzzy friends are fleeing in embarrassment from Jerry Seinfeld's relentless promotional blitz for this lame kiddie movie. In case you somehow haven't heard, the stand-up comic lends his voice to Barry B. Benson, a curious insect who leaves the hive and strikes up an icky romance with Renée Zellweger's gurgly-voiced florist. When Barry discovers that humans have enslaved his fellow bees for the mass production of honey, a nonsensical lawsuit ensues, which prompts a slight ecological disaster and self-congratulatory cameos from the likes of Ray Liotta and Oprah. Seinfeld's milquetoast observational humor hasn't aged particularly well, and as typical of DreamWorks' animated productions, the character designs are ugly and the backgrounds indistinct. It's hard to imagine what children are going to take away from this muddled affair, besides a sinister message to be mindful of your station in life and do what you're told. (In the suburbs.)

Before the Devil Knows You're Dead ★★★½ Disproving the theory that folks mellow with age, 83-year-old director Sidney Lumet enters his fifth decade of filmmaking with the nastiest, most fatalistic thriller of his career. Philip Seymour Hoffman and Ethan Hawke star as financially strapped brothers who attempt to cover debts by knocking off a suburban jewelry store. It's literally a mom-and-pop operation run by their parents (Albert Finney and Rosemary Harris), which sends this seemingly simple bungled heist perilously close to Greek tragedy. Kelly Masterson's screenplay is a grim puzzle-box that zips back and forth through time to savor the Murphy's Law developments. In lesser hands, this could have been a glib Tarantino clone, but Lumet's austere, unobtrusive style allows his actors plenty of room to run and linger on old familial resentments, which develops an emotional resonance rare for this kind of gimmicky crime flick. As always, Hoffman is brilliant, his closed-off cruelty an excellent foil for Hawke's wounded puppy dog performance. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

The Bucket List ★½ There's not a schmaltzy self-help cliché that doesn't show up somewhere in Justin Zackham's screenplay for this soppy tear-jerker, which stars Jack Nicholson and Morgan Freeman as terminal cancer patients who embark on a wild road trip and learn banal life lessons along the way. No points for guessing that Nicholson's sardonic, loutish billionaire discovers all sorts of wisdom from the sage, salt-of-the-earth Freeman. Why is an actor as dynamic as Freeman so often cast as a healing force of neutered sanctimony? Does anybody remember his terrifying breakthrough performance as a vicious pimp in 1987's Street Smart? The man can do more than nod and teach people how to be good. Director Rob Reiner laughably phones it in, as this alleged globetrotting adventure has quite brazenly been photographed on a Los Angeles soundstage. There hasn't been such shameless use of stock footage and shots of actors in front of fake backgrounds since the late '30s. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Charlie Wilson's War ★★½ It should have been the movie of the year. Begging for pointed satire, the true-life saga of a Texas congressman (Tom Hanks) covertly arming and training the Afghan mujahideen is a ripe example of American victories coming back to bite us on the backside. But, working from a sharp and extremely funny script by West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin (here making amends for his odious Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip), director Mike Nichols chickens out by softening all the body-blows with broad comedic flourishes and abruptly pulling the plug before the logical ending. Still, Hanks is a joy to watch as the debauched do-gooder, bantering back and

BLACK GOLD

There Will Be Blood hits pay dirt.

There Will Be Blood
Starring Daniel Day-Lewis, Paul Dano, Kevin J. O'Connor, Ciarán Hinds and Dillon Freasier. Based on the novel Oil! by Upton Sinclair. Written and directed by Paul Thomas Anderson. At Harvard Square and West Newton Cinema.

IT BEGINS IN SILENCE. In fact, not a word of dialogue is spoken for the first 15 minutes of Paul Thomas Anderson's There Will Be Blood, a stark and pitiless gaze into a heart of darkness and something of a demented masterpiece.

Beginning in 1898, but deliberately conjuring memories of Kubrick's 2001, Anderson's opening sequence of bravura finds Daniel Day-Lewis plundering the earth and rooting in the dirt and muck like a grunting caveman, all to the unsettling buzz of Radiohead guitarist Jonny Greenwood's atonal score. Any resemblance to a certain space odyssey is of course intentional; just replace the monolith with a derrick, and watch it gush black gold. Oil, that is.

Day-Lewis, when he eventually speaks, introduces himself as Daniel Plainview, proud to call himself an oilman. He keeps a mewling orphan (Dillon Freasier) as a prop son and carts the boy from town to town, preying on the claims of hayseed farmers who can't see through his "family business" act. Through a combination of skill, blarney and ruthlessness, Plainview spends the early chapters of the 20th century building himself an impressive little empire.

But there's something missing inside Plainview, some crucial disconnect deep within his psyche. He holds himself apart, peering out at the world with a squint of mild disdain, his face shrouded by bushy eyebrows and a stringy moustache. "I don't like... people," he eventually confesses. He appears to gag on the final word, as if his stomach turns saying it out loud.

Everybody gets under this guy's skin, but none with quite the panache of Paul Dano's reverend Eli Sunday. A pious huckster with a moon face and squeaky voice, Dano is an extraordinary irritant. He can see through Plainview's scheme to financially pillage the California farm town of New Boston, but instead of leading a moral crusade, Sunday just wants to make damn sure he gets his cut. The young preacher makes it known that he will happily accept Plainview's generous contributions, and thus the two begin a passive-aggressive battle of wits that drags on for decades.

Some have questioned the entertainment value of spending two hours and 40 minutes with a seething, antisocial millionaire who eschews redemption and calcifies into an ever more monstrous gargoyle as time grinds along. I wonder if these folks have seen Raging Bull, or Citizen Kane for that matter. Great movie characters do not require our affection, only our fascination. And there is no more fascinating actor on the face of the planet than Day-Lewis.

He seldom works these days. In fact, There Will Be Blood is only his third screen appearance this decade. As Plainview, he gives the character a spindly and contorted physicality. He speaks in a florid rasp, echoing the regal cadences of the late John Huston. There are hints and intonations of his indelible Gangs of New York character, Bill the Butcher, prompting a pal to praise "this new genre of historical epics starring Daniel Day-Lewis as America."

There is no more fascinating actor on the face of the planet than Daniel Day-Lewis.

And then there's Anderson. Not yet 40 years old, he is the most prodigiously gifted and oddly divisive member of our current crop of young filmmakers. His gleeful self-indulgence and reckless ambition seems to polarize audiences, as I still fondly recall a press screening of Anderson's Magnolia that nearly incited a riot. (Or at least the closest approximation one can have in a room full of critics.) For the majority of the film, There Will Be Blood is a startling change of pace for the auteur. Devoid of his hot-dog tracking shots and surrealistic flourishes, the filmmaking here is icy and restrained, relying on still, classical compositions.

It's also a thematic 180, as Anderson's Hard Eight, Boogie Nights, Punch-Drunk Love and especially Magnolia were all fundamentally tales of lonely outsiders finding solace in others and forging communities where least expected. There Will Be Blood inverts the formula, as a new American century takes root and thrives everywhere around Plainview, and yet he only grows more isolated, tearing himself from his family, his associates and eventually the world.

Then comes the ending. Apparently aspiring to top the rain of frogs that kicked Magnolia into mad genius territory, Anderson finally allows the simmering tensions and nagging disquiet of There Will Be Blood to explode in such a gonzo theatrical showcase of Method acting histrionics you have to see it to believe it. As with the frogs, it'll be a deal breaker for half the audience, while the rest of us will see it as the only possible way the movie could have ended, by fulfilling the promise of the title and then some. In oilman terms, it's a gusher. ✖✖✖ forth with Philip Seymour Hoffman's movie-stealing CIA crank. Wildly miscast as a voracious millionaire man-eater, Julia Roberts does a lousy Susan Sarandon impression. There are enough meaty moments to make the film almost worthwhile, but it's too bad Nichols pulled so many punches. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Diving Bell and the Butterfly ★★½ Formerly a famous irritant on the 1980s New York art scene, painter Julian Schnabel has evolved into a fascinating filmmaker, helming unconventional, if spotty, biographical pieces boasting kicky, exploratory visuals. The Diving Bell and the Butterfly tells the tale of Elle magazine editor Jean-Dominique Bauby, felled by a stroke and unable to move anything but his left eyelid. The condition, described here as "locked-in syndrome," hardly kept Bauby from penning his memoirs. It just took a bit more work than expected. Schnabel shoots huge chunks of the movie from his protagonist's point of view, the screen cutting to black as he communicates by blinking. As Bauby, Mathieu Almeric, the Roman Polanski look-alike who stole so many scenes in Steven Spielberg's Munich, brings a dry wit to the narration and finds sneaky ways around his role's obvious restrictions. Like Schnabel's Basquiat and Before Night Falls, Diving Bell is maddeningly inconsistent but has a lyrical sense of freedom. It's anything but locked-in. (At Coolidge Corner.)

Enchanted ★★★ Doe-eyed Amy Adams, the one memorable thing about 2005's somnambulist Southern drama Junebug, delivers a genuine star-making performance in Disney's latest reboot of its fairy princess franchise. Adams plays Giselle, a perky cartoon whisked away to modern-day Manhattan by the spell of a wicked witch (Susan Sarandon, naturally). The clash of animated sensibilities and banal real life gets a sufficient workout in Bill Kelly's screenplay, as our heroine spins lavish costumes out of curtains and sings with her animal friends, but since this is NYC, they're rats and cockroaches. As Giselle's improbable love interest, Patrick Dempsey seems to assume that his hair will do the acting for him. Not so, though, for James Marsden, hamming up a storm as a blowhard Prince Charming. There are enough nifty ideas swirling around Enchanted; one wishes the filmmakers had been a bit more adventurous. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Fred Claus ★ The mere idea of Vince Vaughn playing Santa Claus' loser brother is enough to make you laugh. Throw in the brilliant casting of Paul Giamatti as Saint Nick, and it's hard not to imagine Fred Claus as a holiday classic waiting to happen. But what should've been a diversion as light as 2003's Elf ends up feeling as laborious as that legendary 1985 Dudley Moore dud, Santa Claus: The Movie. Lavishly overbudgeted with enormous eyesore sets and creepy prosthetic makeup work, director David Dobkin's film ladles out enough plotlines for three separate movies and leaves Vaughn stuck sputtering some disappointingly PG riffs, unsure if he should rescue an orphan sidekick, reunite with his annoying girlfriend (Rachel Weisz) or try to keep Kevin Spacey's officious efficiency expert from closing Santa's workshop. Unable to even follow its own tortured logic, the movie veers from one overblown, saccharine set piece to another over a mirthless two hours. Bah, humbug. (In the suburbs.)

Gone Baby Gone ★★★ Good news: Ben Affleck isn't embarrassing anymore. With his confident, downbeat directorial debut, the artist formerly known as Bennifer redeems himself, exhibiting a fantastic knack for getting the most out of Boston's grimmer locations while supplying a star-making role for his kid brother, Casey. Based on the novel by Dennis Lehane, Gone Baby Gone digs deep into the buried secrets of the Dorchester projects after the mysterious disappearance of a 4-year-old girl. As a conscience-stricken private detective, the younger Affleck is a modern-day Phillip Marlowe in a tracksuit as he navigates grungy barrooms and flings four-letter words before arriving at a moral dilemma that's all but impossible to resolve. The picture loses considerable steam in its second hour, with too many expository sequences required to resolve Lehane's knotty plotting. But the extraordinary final shot will provoke discussion and argument long after the closing credits have rolled and announces not just a morally complex vision, but also the arrival of a potentially great filmmaker. Who knew Ben still had it in him? (In the suburbs.)

I Am Legend ★★★ For a large portion of its running time, director Francis Lawrence's stark and handsomely mounted take on Richard Matheson's oft-filmed novel has a bracing sense of despair and an intelligence uncommon for a mega-budget blockbuster starring Will Smith. The former Fresh Prince dials down his trademark self-regard quite effectively as the sole survivor of a plague that's turned the world's population into sunlight-averse, poorly computer-animated zombies. The real star of the film is New York City, which has never appeared so desolate and empty. There is a stillness that's seriously unnerving. Smith's last man standing is drifting perilously close to dementia, and Lawrence punishes him with carefully crafted, prolonged suspense sequences. The movie is so smart and so dark for so long, you start to wonder when the Hollywood rubbish is going to begin. Then come the explosions and nonsense and pandering speeches about faith. Still, two-thirds of a great movie is better than nothing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Into the Wild ★★★½ In 1990, Christopher McCandless (Emile Hirsch) donated his life savings to Oxfam, burned his Social Security card and disappeared down the highway into self-imposed obscurity. Rechristening himself "Alexander Supertramp," McCandless yearned to live the kind of pure existence he'd only read about in books by Henry David Thoreau and Jack London. Two years later he starved to death inside an abandoned bus in Alaska, barely 20 miles from the highway. Plenty of people consider McCandless a hero. Countless folk songs have been written about his journey, and that bus has become a popular tourist attraction. Just as many people, especially in Alaska, will tell you he was an idiot. The beauty of this film, written and directed by Sean Penn, is that it's both dreamy and lucid and filled with a deep respect for McCandless' ideals, but it never lets him off the hook for the spitefulness and naiveté inherent in his foolish, transcendent quest. It feels like a breakthrough for Penn as it throbs with color, possibilities and hope. (In the suburbs.) culture references than recognizable human emotion. The overqualified cast includes Ellen Page as a precocious and knocked-up 16-year-old, and Superbad's Michael Cera, pricelessly inarticulate as the baby daddy. Dependable character actors J.K. Simmons, Jason Bateman and Allison Janney wrestle whatever feeling they can out of Cody's one-note smarm, but director Jason Reitman undercuts their efforts with too-cute flourishes and an aura of smug self-satisfaction rivaling that of his similarly over-praised debut, Thank You for Smoking. Juno is already a hit, which is no surprise considering how much it aims to flatter its target audience. Mileage may vary, depending on your tolerance for hipster affectations. Personally, I felt like I was trapped in Allston past my bedtime. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Lars and the Real Girl ★★½ Genuine sweetness wrestles with whimsy-overload in director Craig Gillespie's gentle tale of a lonely, emotionally stunted young man (Ryan Gosling, laying it on a little thick) who orders a sex doll over the Internet and deludes himself into thinking she's real. Yes, this sounds incredibly icky, but Six Feet Under scribe Nancy Oliver's screenplay is surprisingly chaste, choosing to focus mainly on the affecting little ways this small snowy community tries to help their troubled neighbor by playing along with his fantasy. The best work comes from up-and-coming actor Paul Schneider, who recently stole scenes left and right in The Assassination of Jesse James, here playing Gosling's conflicted older brother with a stillness and warmth that trumps his costar's overly mannered turn. Gillespie is a bit too in love with the wintry atmospherics and lets the pace slacken until the audience ends up two or three scenes ahead of the movie. Some nice moments, though. (In the suburbs.)

Margot at the Wedding ★★★ Nicole Kidman stars as the worst mother since Medea, or at least since Livia Soprano, a neurotic, passive-aggressive bundle of nerves who begins the movie by dragging her androgynous, deeply confused adolescent son (Zane Pais) along for an ill-advised reunion with her estranged sister (Jennifer Jason Leigh). For one cringe-inducing scene after another, we're waiting for Margot's self-righteous bubble to finally burst, and yet she somehow manages to say exactly the wrong thing and make a bad situation infinitely worse. Gratingly unpleasant yet often hilarious, writer-director Noah Baumbach's follow up to his 2005 I-hate-my-dad hit The Squid and the Whale again mines the grim comedy of embarrassment, as it cuts in and out of scenes at unexpected moments with a jittery, hand-held camera that's always zoomed in a little too close for comfort. In other words, the movie would probably be unwatchable if it weren't so damn funny. (In the suburbs.)

Michael Clayton ★★★½ Another whip-smart, politically savvy flick from star/executive producer George Clooney, who cements his status as a throwback to the age of heavyweight leading men with enough gravitas to handle flawed, complicated leading roles. Clooney's title character, a burnt-out fixer for a big-money Manhattan law firm, finds himself growing a conscience after witnessing the shabby treatment of his esteemed colleague (the great Tom Wilkinson) when the latter threatens to blow a billion-dollar lawsuit over a carcinogenic weed-killer. Shot primarily in metallic shades of gray by cinematographer Robert Elswit, Bourne-trilogy screenwriter Tony Gilroy's impressively lean directorial debut has little patience for soft-hearted pieties or conventional modern uplift. The kind of stark, paranoid star vehicle that probably would have been a summer blockbuster back in the early '70s, Michael Clayton oozes class and adult sophistication. Clooney carries the picture on his weary shoulders, subtle glimmers of long-buried idealism slowly dawning behind his downcast eyes. The picture's stirring climax isn't physical but instead a verbal boxing match that's more exciting than most shoot-outs. (In the suburbs.)

Last Man Standing

Suspense and the City West Philadelphia has nothing on zombie-infested New York in Will Smith's I Am Legend.

Mr. Magorium's Wonder Emporium ★ Delivering the kind of confident, extravagantly awful performance that perhaps only a genius would even dare, Dustin Hoffman shrieks and sputters his way through this horrific, bargain-basement Willy Wonka rip-off, which is also the directorial debut from hotshot screenwriter Zack Helm. As a 234-year-old toy maker who appears to have suffered a debilitating stroke, Hoffman putters around a cluttered junk shop, sharing the screen with bad special effects and imparting fortune-cookie wisdom regarding magic and wonder. As his faithful assistant suffering a quarter-life crisis, Natalie Portman vapidly hangs her mouth open while the talky and misguided scenario veers into some bizarre meditation on the inevitability of death. As with Helm's script for Stranger Than Fiction, Magorium follows no internal logic and confounds the viewer at every maudlin turn. Boasting some of the ugliest production design you'll see all year, this eyesore of a movie looks garish, tacky and cheap. (In the suburbs.)

No Country for Old Men ★★★★ Adapted from the 2005 novel by Cormac McCarthy, Joel and Ethan Coen's No Country for Old Men is an enthralling, devastating movie experience. Stripped to the bone, it's a model of ruthless narrative efficiency that blossoms into something much larger than the sum of its precision-tooled parts. What at first seems like the simple saga of two tough hombres and a bag of money eventually attains a mythic, almost Biblical grandeur. For days afterwards, it haunts your dreams—the bad ones. The Coens have at last gone back to their roots, infusing No Country with the clockwork meticulousness and parched landscapes of their killer 1984 debut, Blood Simple. The movie is almost unbearably suspenseful and boasts the filmmakers' trademark strain of sicko gallows humor. But there's also something new here: a palpable sense of sorrow and genuine emotional resonance. For the first time in their brilliant career, it finally feels like the merry pranksters are out to do more than crack themselves up. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Savages ★★★½ Grim, funny and unsentimental, writer-director Tamara Jenkins' follow-up to her 1998 dysfunctional-family comedy, Slums of Beverly Hills, stars Philip Seymour Hoffman and Laura Linney as sourpuss siblings facing difficult decisions as their estranged, abusive father (Philip Bosco) heads toward dementia. If you think this is going to be a sweet comedy of familial reconciliation, take another look at that surname. Muted in tone and clad beneath a brilliantly shabby production design, The Savages has a humdrum grit often missing even from indie movies. The more unsavory aspects of contemporary eldercare are confronted in a similarly blunt fashion with a minimum of speechifying. Hoffman and Linney are, as usual, extraordinary. Like most siblings facing a crisis, they fall back into the roles assigned to them in childhood. There's no grand deathbed catharsis and no monologues about lessons learned. When all is said and done, the characters have merely slouched ever so slightly closer to adulthood. The movie feels tough, and true. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street ★★★ This isn't your kid sister's musical. Drenched in rivers of blood, Sweeney Todd is a black-hearted, at times disgustingly comic meditation on the price of vengeance. As luck would have it, Steven Sondheim's gory extravaganza is exactly what director Tim Burton needed to get his groove back. Sweeney Todd is his best picture in years—ghoulishly delightful and subversive. There is a clarity and completeness of vision marking a welcome return to Burton's mischievous Goth sensibility. Johnny Depp stars as the wronged barber who sates his thirst for retribution by slitting the throats of his customers and tossing their corpses into the basement, where his daffy old landlady (played with dizzy deadpan timing by Helena Bonham Carter) grinds up the bodies and bakes them into pies. Depp and Bonham Carter are wonderful, save for one teensy caveat: They can't sing. Burton's swooping, inventive camerawork and the soul-stirring orchestrations too often soar towards transcendence, only to be dragged down by the pedestrian vocalizing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Walk Hard: The Dewey Cox Story ★★ Feeling a day late and a dollar short after I'm Not There laid waste to the musical biopic, director Jake Kasdan's thin parody of Walk The Line and Ray takes a couple of halfway decent jokes and flogs them to death for 90 minutes. John C. Reilly is playful and game as clueless country music legend Dewey Cox, a lout prone to fathering children and becoming addicted to whatever drug is in front of him. It's a ramshackle vehicle, eventually sputtering its way through psychedelia and the '70s, relying on bizarre cameos and inane riffs on Dewey's last name. The Office's Jenna Fischer has some great moments as a goody-two-shoes sex bomb prone to innuendo, but overall the movie feels lazy and undisciplined. Cowriter and current comedy guru Judd Apatow's character-driven sensibilities are wasted on this sketch revue format. A few good gags aren't enough for an entire movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Youth Without Youth ★ Presumably distracted by his successful wine business, the legendary Francis Ford Coppola hasn't set foot behind a camera in 10 years. His bonkers, independently financed comeback attempt suggests he probably should have stayed in the vineyards. Incoherently adapted by Coppola himself from a novella by Mircea Eliade, this crazy-pants rumination on the passage of time stars Tim Roth as a 70-year-old suicidal academic who gets struck by lightning and finds himself young again. It gets weirder, as he soon reconnects with the long-deceased love of his life (fetching newcomer Alexandra Maria Lara) who's likewise struck by lightning and begins channeling a seventh-century sage while speaking Sanskrit in her sleep. Or something like that. The melancholy, coma-inducing pomposity isn't even punctured when Roth develops superpowers or when Matt Damon wanders in for a cameo, clearly as confused as the audience. There's some beautiful digital photography by Mihai Malaimare Jr., but to quote a previous Coppola picture: "The Don is slipping." (At Waltham Embassy.)

Leni Stern plays Scullers Jazz Club Jan. 17.

CONTINENTAL DRIFTER

Leni Stern finds a new home for her impressionistic jazz.

Amy Giunta

LENI STERN HAD HELP with her holiday shopping last month in the markets of West Africa. The blonde guitarist-singer had recorded her latest album in Mali and Senegal, shared stages and studios with local icons Salif Keita and Baaba Maal, and made a video for one song. Now fans on the street were shouting her name and suggesting gifts for her to buy.

"The video is on television twice a day," Stern says from Bakamo, Mali, where she still visits for weeks at a time. "That's why when I go to the market, people know me.

"I've never found a people more hospitable than Africans, especially when you're a guitarist, which musically crosses all boundaries," says Stern, who recorded Africa with many musicians and singers from the region, plus such jazz stars as Michael Brecker (who died before the disc was finished) and her guitarist husband, Mike Stern. She'll bring a group of both African and American musicians to Scullers Jan. 17.

"I don't think you can put a monetary price on what I've done," says Stern, 55, who released more than a dozen solo discs which bridge jazz fusion and impressionistic singer-songwriter fare before making Africa. continued on page 63

"It's the record I'm proudest of. I'm so grateful to all the African musicians who have taken me into their families, into their culture."

It's been quite a journey for the German-born, New York–based artist, who grew up in Munich and initially favored theater over music. "When I was a young girl, if you told somebody that you wanted to be an electric guitar player, they'd have taken you straight to the therapist," Stern says. "It was considered a completely irrational idea."

Regardless, she moved to Boston, where she played guitar and studied film scoring at Berklee College of Music. That's where she met her future husband, who has pursued his own successful jazz-fusion career without collaborating much with his wife. "Our music is very much connected," she says, "but we choose not to make it a public affair."

Her penchant for adventure (she has also studied Hindustani vocal music in India) was only fueled by winning a battle with breast cancer in the late '80s. "It makes you very aware that you're mortal," Stern says. "You have a gift, but it's not forever, so you make the most of every day."

She also holds a black belt in kung fu. "If you want to live like a man, you should have the same responsibilities as a man," says Stern, who first traveled to Mali two years ago to attend the Festival in the Desert—and sleep in a tent much like the nomadic Tuareg people of the region.

"I can't describe what an amazing experience it is to come to a place where you have no idea how to speak the language beyond 'Hello' and 'Thank you' and you can play for two hours," says Stern, who quickly befriended some of the musicians who play on Africa, a sublime blend of songcraft, jazz and Afro-pop. And when Keita heard Stern's work, he invited her to join his band, where she honed her curly guitar phrasing in intensive rehearsals. "I, of course, came to Africa with the hope of learning that feel," she says, noting that with an African rhythm section, "timing is totally different.

"It's no accident that I ended up in Salif's band," Stern says of the albino Afro-pop star known as the Golden Voice of Africa. "He's always surrounded himself with people who are unusual because it makes him feel like he's not the only unusual person.... It's because of his voice that people love him. But albinos are not loved in Africa."

Stern wrote some politically poetic songs for Africa, most notably "Child Soldier" with its haunting refrain, "I want to go home." And she recalls that when Baaba Maal invited her to perform with him at one festival, she sang "10,000 Butterflies," a song about refugees from an earlier disc, and Maal echoed the lyrics in the native Pular language.

"It was a huge soccer stadium and people went crazy, they were so happy," she says. "As songwriters, it's our duty to witness and speak, because people listen to us. If we don't say it, who's going to say it?" Stern embraces her role. ***

Terra Burma After nearly 20 years of decibel-crunching alt rock, Boston post-punk heroes Mission of Burma are finally living up to their name. On Jan. 20 at Great Scott, the band plays a benefit gig for the U.S. Campaign for Burma–a nonprofit devoted to ending the Southeast Asian nation's military dictatorship. Of course, there'll be lots of feedback, cassette loops and guitars so ferocious they make younger groups sound like kazoo bands.

Magic Carpet Ride

Happy Accidents This untitled work is one of more than 65 vintage snapshots from the collection of John and Teenuh Foster on display at the Peabody Essex Museum through Jan. 27. Taken for personal use, many of the photos exhibit double exposures or other darkroom mishaps. These idiosyncracies force the viewer to look at the images out of context and to consider their origins.

HYATT REGENCY BOSTON

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

GOAT SPRINGS ETERNAL

[DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20]
What began in October—when militant Mars first entered your Cancer house of allies and antagonists—continues to demand your attention until Mars moves on to Leo around Mother's Day. Since this seven-month trip through your marriage house won't occur again, try to resolve as many of the issues Mars activated as possible. Talk them out with your lawyers, agents, business partners, and past and present spouses. But while Mercury is retrograde in your Aquarius house of assets next month, postpone signing any agreement.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
Not a whole lot changes this year. Imaginative Neptune in your sign continues to inspire or deceive you, before taking a retrograde break from Memorial Day to Halloween. And your inventive, but erratic Uranus ruler continues to float through your Pisces house of assets and values, at times disrupting your money stream, other times increasing the flow. However, 2008 could well be your year of karmic cleaning. The many benefits Jupiter in Capricorn bestows get filtered through your 12th house of dreams and cosmic consciousness. Take notes.

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
The complicated dance Fish are doing with the Water Bearer continues to enchant you both. Magic happens in public places in the spring, very much in private in the fall. During summer you take a well-deserved break. Saturn in your Virgo marriage house insists that couples get serious about their commitment to each other and the institution itself. Business partners clean house and organize their efforts more effectively. March is ideal for intense romantic and creative activity. A happier happy birthday!

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
Depending on which country you find yourself in, 2008 could be your year of living dangerously. Rams are noted risk-takers; however, the ones you choose this year could be more goal-oriented than those you've taken for the sheer hell of it. Be it a spiritual journey, a photo safari or a school year abroad, there's a good chance that with lucky Jupiter as your guide, you'll come away not only richer in experience, but wealthier as well. As for romance, a tried-and-true relationship is your best bet until summer. Then, fireworks!

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
Finally, a year tailor-made for earth signs! What should fit you to a T is generous Jupiter's transit through your Capricorn house of life-long aspirations. This year, you may actually get what you've yearned for, and more to the point, without the sweat or the attendant anxiety. Of course, you'll still need to be patient, especially in matters of affection and art. Stoical Saturn in your Virgo house of romance and creativity will continue to make that area of your life worth the attention that perfection demands.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Twins have until March, which is when take-action Mars leaves Gemini, to make the major move they've been deliberating. Otherwise, it might not come about until Mars returns in summer '09. Keep in mind that your Mercury ruler is retrograde from the end of January until Feb. 18, from Memorial Day until June 19 and from the autumn equinox until mid-October. Give yourself a few days before and after Mercury's stations to acclimate to these changes in direction before you boldly go anywhere you haven't been before.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
It's not only the earth signs that'll benefit from Jupiter's transit through Capricorn, the addition of powerful Pluto to that ambitious sign, plus Saturn's continuing sojourn in discerning Virgo, constitute a positive prognosis for water signs as well. Pisces and Scorpio will receive sustenance and structure from Earth and, for Cancer, significant support from partnership (Capricorn) arrangements. However, until independent Mars exits your sign on May 9, also the day Jupiter turns retrograde, you may prefer to go it alone.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
Magnetic Venus in your high-spirited Sagittarius house of recreation and romance from Dec. 30 until Jan. 24 is a good reason to make hay while the sun shines on the slopes. No matter how long your vacation, be sure to take it and make it memorable. The rest of the year is infused with a strong work ethic that'll pay off handsomely when constructive Saturn in your personal money house is rewarded by generous Jupiter in Capricorn: Martin Luther King Jr. weekend, early September and Thanksgiving. Solar Aquarius is also good.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22]
Read Gemini for the dates when your Mercury ruler goes retrograde for three weeks at a clip and leaves you twiddling your thumbs or thumbing a ride. Energetic Mars in your Gemini career house until March 4 may provide an opportunity disguised as an offer you can't refuse, not if you want to advance in your chosen field. However, it's durable Saturn in your own sign that'll keep you grounded during the highs and lows of seasonal changes. The partnerships continue to be unpredictable and frequently brilliant.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
Despite the bad press, 2008 could be the year to buy your dream house. Jupiter, the Greater Fortune, residing in your Capricorn home base for the next 12 months can be a fount of wealth and happiness. Even more so while your artistic Venus ruler visits from Jan. 24 through President's Day. Family affairs take an upturn in spring, although not without a struggle or clever manipulation. But it is your physical appearance and personal desires that take center stage as courageous Mars blasts through Libra in September.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
Hanging at the high end of the gene pool isn't going to end anytime soon. Status-seeking Saturn continues to dominate your house of public recognition in 2008, although until it comes out of retrograde in May you might not appreciate the advantages of hobnobbing with the honchos. May is also when your energetic Mars coruler enters Leo and adds a burst of creativity to your career aspirations. "It's good to be King" if only for the summer. Romance blossoms in March when Venus and erratic, erotic Uranus hook up in Pisces.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] It's a short interlude and not necessarily a sweet one; however, the attraction of opposites, between alluring Venus in your sign and passionate Mars in your Gemini marriage house, over the Martin Luther King Jr. weekend is not to be missed. No matter where you're spending the holiday, be on the lookout for an Aries or a Scorpio with the gift of gab and something to read. Remember: your luxury-loving Jupiter ruler spends 2008 in your Capricorn money house, plus Pluto's arrival could transform your financial profile forever.

GIRLS FROM GOOD HOMES...

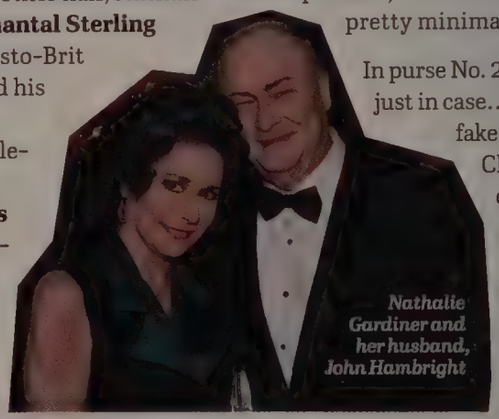
Julie Hume Talmage and Krysti[illegible]n Von Speidel

Walkin' in a Winter Wonder Ball

Before the 1960s, all a debutante needed to carry in her purse was a lipstick, a compact, and a few bucks for tips and maybe a taxi. In the '70s and '80s she needed the same things, plus some form of birth control and an eight ball of cocaine.

It seemed like an interesting idea to see what today's debs pack in their clutches (space being such a major consideration with evening bags), so we went to the Winter Ball, the black-tie, blue-blooded hoo-ha that raises money for Vincent Memorial Hospital at MGH, held in the grand ballroom of the Park Plaza.

In addition to serving as a sort of high-society Christmas party, the evening honors the 2007 debutantes—Elizabeth Mason Paine Atkin, London Clark Hunnewell Blake, Alix Elizabeth Dana, Wynne Achelis Evans, Kelly Rachel Rodigas, Molly Amory Storer and Anne Clairborne Thompson—although only five of them could make it. On hand to wish them well were such warm and welcome faces as proud parents Donna and Bob Storer, devilishly handsome debutante escort Teddy Talbott and his swan-like mom, Michelle, stunning sisters Rebecca and Julia Spiro, Czar Nicholas look-alike Krystian von Speidel and his other half, Nathan Frank, the statuesque Chantal Sterling with her man, Darryl, aristo-Brit Andrew MacIlwraith and his Brahmin wife, Tish, her father and grand old gentleman Michael Robbins, Chestnut Hillion Thomas Handasyd Perkins Whitney (looking seasonal in a green velvet jacket and red waistcoat) and his wife, Vicky, bubbly blonde Mary Kakas (dripping in vintage Cartier), the relentlessly social Thurman Smith, numerous men wearing medals or other decorations, and women all dolled up in ball gowns.



Nathalie Gardiner and her husband, John Hambright

Nathan Frank and Chantal and Darryl Sterling

On the promise of anonymity, we cornered the girls in white dresses while they were still in the receiving line and later got each of them to provide an inventory of her purse.

For contrast, we also canvassed a few women of another generation. Back Bay doyenne and TV host Smoki Bacon said her purse had "my glasses, lipstick and a comb. My husband has all the money." Bejeweled and bedazzling socialite Nathalie Gardiner, meanwhile, had lipstick, Kleenex, a house key, cash, a comb, eyedrops and pills, "but nothing illegal."

In the first debutante purse was a cell phone, a fake ID, lip gloss and an extra set of false eyelashes in case the ones she was wearing fell off, along with a bit of cash ("for the unexpected"). "That's about it," she said. "I'm pretty minimalist."

In purse No. 2 was cash ("for whatever, just in case... truthfully, for alcohol"), a fake ID, a real license, a Verizon Chocolate cell phone, lip gloss called "Almost Nothing," a camera, and (before the ball started) the diamond bracelet, pearl necklace and diamond-and-sapphire ring she planned on wearing that night.

Purse No. 3 contained a pack of Parliaments, a pink lighter, a cell phone and some cash. Purse No. 4: a camera, phone, CVS brand chapstick, a hotel key, a fake ID and Adderall (a prescription drug commonly used to treat hyperactivity).

Debutante No. 5 was a bit coy about the contents of her purse, saying it had "tons of diamonds. There might be a few rubies in there, but mostly diamonds." When asked if she didn't have at least some cash for tips, she said, "No. That's what the diamonds are for."

This is the girl we suspect was carrying an eight ball of cocaine. Either that, or they need to change her prescription. ×××

Oh Man!

I don't know much about men, other than what I've gathered by living with one. So I left it to the guys on staff to cook up the main feature this issue. They suggested sending Ezra into the woods to see if he could use his macho skills to survive and make it back to the office. Like a true warrior (or fool), he accepted the challenge.

In addition to his wilderness adventure, you'll find a six-page spread on boyish looks for spring. The story comes from Ruth Basloe, our new fashion editor who has worked at Self, Mademoiselle and Harper's Bazaar, among other publications. Ruth has a chic, approachable sensibility that matches the Improper's new feel.

You could say the same about cover boy Eric Mabius, star of Ugly Betty. Although Mabius portrays a playboy on TV, in real life he married a fellow student from Amherst Regional High School. Which, as it happens, I know something about, having gotten hitched to my own teenage crush. A decidedly girly admission.

Barley Legal

HOP STAR

Todd Charbonneau must have spent past life healing lepers and rescuing puppies from bad homes. There's no other karmic explanation for his job: head brewer at Boston's beloved Harpoon Brewery. This at a time when beer has as much clout as wine.

"Ten years ago I answered a newspaper ad for a bottling line position," says Charbonneau, 34. "I spent eight months working on a bottle-unpacking machine, then I was able to piggyback to a new keg-filling machine." From this humble beginning, he rose through the ranks, moving from packaging to filtering to, finally, brewing the sacred nectar itself. "I hear a lot of, 'You've got the best job!'" he says. "'You must drink beer all day!'"

Charbonneau dismisses the current buzz over trendy "extreme" beers loaded with skull-splitting doses of alcohol and hops. "It's just a new name on a lot of old takes," he says. Old takes like Harpoon IPA, Charbonneau's "fridge beer" and the one he would like served at his deathbed. "Given its aggressive bitter characteristics, it's probably our most macho brew," he says. "If you ever lose sight of things, of why you're here, you just pour yourself a glass."

ANDREW RIMAS

Drink of the Moment

Nymphomania

At Mission Hill's Savant Project, buxom graffiti girls adorn the walls and the booze menu's as much about lust as it is about liquor. There you'll find the three Nymphs, a trio of beer cocktails competing for your attention like tipsy sorority sisters at a mixer. With additional drinks like the Donkey Punch and the Pimm's Cup, the cocktail list belches in the face of pretense. "We're all kind of perverted here, and that comes across in the menu," says Luis Sanchez, the restaurant's cofounder. "It's borderline offensive."

The tastes are not, and the cheeky theme belies the Nymphs' complexity. The Redhead is a bitter mix of ginger brandy, framboise, Pilsner Urquell and B&B, the brandy leaving a slight burn that lingers between nips. The Brunette blends ruby port, seasonal Harpoon and lime. This season's version tastes like Winter Warmer but amplified with more spice, which basically means it looks innocent but means trouble. At the tail end is the Blonde. With a sweetness that bombards the tip of the tongue, she's light and refreshing but lacking in dimension.

"Well, blondes are usually on the bottom, aren't they?" Sanchez jokes.

Good Eats

WING BUFFS This city boasts an insatiable appetite for hearty competition, and we sure know how to belly up to the bar when the ball's in play. Whether or not Tom and Randy headline February's showdown (we went to press before the AFC championship), we'll grab stools at this old favorite. The beer flows cheap, the flat screens flash in high def and the house-favorite Honey Hots pack everything you could want in a wing: tang, meatiness and just a bit of burn. You can even get them to go—a hit at any Super Bowl party.

ASK THE EXPERT

MARGO HOWARD
"DEAR MARGO" ADVICE COLUMNIST

Q: QUESTION: HOW CAN YOU POLITELY TALK POLITICS IN A SOCIAL SETTING?

I fear the answer is, "You can't." Politics has become a hot topic in the sense that tempers get hot and discussions get heated. A friend at [the Republican National Committee] told me that even he was shocked at the vitriol and "hatred" the Republicans had for the Democrats. My suggestion for political discussions amongst friends would be: It is OK, when the subject comes up, to say who you're for and why. When someone comes back at you—disputing your facts or opinions—it is pointless to argue because you will never change anyone's mind. Could anyone change yours?

Caledonian Club

Single-malt Scotch whiskey reigns as the ultimate macho power drink. It has just enough of a clubby image (the unpronounceable names, the packaging, the aging, the prices) to appease your inner snob. Perhaps less understood is the artisan care lavished on the production and the fine points of differentiation in aroma and flavor. Here are some best bets.

OBAN
14-Year-Old West Highlands (Federal Wine, $62.95) A favorite, this Scotch is absolutely classic in a lighter, more delicate style. With a sweet herb and floral aroma that shows flashes of vanilla and orange peel, it's creamy and spicy, but subtle at the same time. The long finish emphasizes citric, oily flavors.

GLEN GARIOCH
15-Year-Old East Highlands (Martignetti's, $40)
An absolute steal if you like the style. Quite fruity and complex, with smoky, tarry, mushroom-accented woodsy aromas and a touch of shortbread, this Highland malt has a lush, rounded texture that finishes extremely minty on the palate.

LAGAVULIN
16-Year-Old Islay (Marty's, $55)
Islay is the island off Scotland's east coast where extreme peaty medicinal scents often make their way into the malts. Not with this mellow beauty. Its charming smokiness doesn't dominate but is interwoven with scents of heather, banana, caramel and sea air.

TALISKER
18-Year-Old Isle of Skye (Bauer Wine, $75) Produced at the last remaining distillery on the Isle of Skye, the Talisker 18 is a stunner: intense and rich on the palate, with deceptively mild aromas of wildflowers, vanilla, prunes and white pepper. A very classy sip, it shows the effects of extra aging.

BOWMORE
18-Year-Old Islay (Blanchards, $80)
This edged out the Talisker for top honors. Not dramatically peaty, in the typical Islay mode, it has an aroma of tangerine, earth, leather and some seaweed. The flavors are tangy, with hints of fruit.

Going Out

THE STATION AGENT

People still walk into 25 Kingston St. expecting the warm colors and fusion cuisine of Peking Tom's. Instead it feels like a dim subway depot in some other city. With tea-stained tiles, black grout and a stainless steel bar, Kingston Station looks like a cross between an underground bistro and a place that gets hosed down regularly.

Opened in the fall, the Station was born from owner Ky Nguyen's culinary dissatisfaction while living in Chinatown. "I was always frustrated with the restaurants around here," he says. "There's lots of high-end places and lots of low-end places, but no place where I could go every day."

After enjoying the brief dot-com era and a stint in New York's hedge fund world, Nguyen began climbing the restaurateur ladder. "I went from owning an Internet company to being a busboy," he says. "I worked to learn how to do things the right way."

Influenced by restaurants like Pastis and Balthazar, he brought the bistro sensibility back to Boston with a few subtle twists provided by former Prezza chef Matthew O'Neil. There's the burger with a sunny-side-up organic egg ($15) and truffle frites with Gruyère ($10), the potatoes aged, fresh cut, then twice fried in canola oil.

Of course, no downtown venue would be complete without ample booze, and the Station's cocktail selection doesn't disappoint. There's the Hemingway ($8), the French 75 ($7-$11) and the once illicit, now ubiquitous absinthe—that licorice sucker punch served with water and sugar cubes.

"There's not a lot you can mix it with," admits bar manager Eric Pierce. "It's not super cocktail-friendly."

Adds Nguyen, "It's got alcohol; it gets you drunk; it gets the job done." Much like the restaurant itself.

COMMUTER KNOWS BEST

TO THE MAN WHO HONKED and yelled at me and then drove menacingly close to my bicycle:

Maybe you don't know that bikes are legally supposed to be on the street.* Maybe you don't notice that my body isn't enclosed by metal and protected by airbags and a safety belt. Maybe it's hard for you to see that I'm wearing a fluorescent yellow jacket and that my bike has three flashing lights, and that I'm clearly showing my intentions with hand signals. And maybe it's hard for you to understand that I'm only trying to get home from work with my basket full of groceries, not insult anyone or be a badass or slow you down. Maybe you see everything through your windshield as if it's a video game, and you don't really comprehend that I could die if you just tap my bicycle with your front bumper causing me to fall under the wheels of that bus behind you. And just maybe you've never considered what grotesque acrobatics could happen to my body if I rode too close to a parked car that someone suddenly decided to exit. Common Sense 101 and the slightest power of observation can enlighten you to all of the above, so what's your excuse? I'm doing something that's good for my body, good for the environment and makes me feel free and happy, instead of being pissed off at being stuck in traffic in a car. I wish you would try it! Seriously, I'm a human on a bike. So take it easy.

Safety-First Bike Gal

* That's right, with the cars!

 If you want to speed through the city streets, ride a bike!

To the drivers who are always itching to run over pedestrians when they're turning right on a green light:

They think the pedestrians are just being annoying, jumping out there in front of the car, but what they don't notice is that the peds also have a walk signal! (This happens all over Boston—go ahead and call the police department, but they already know and don't really care. I saw a Jeep inching impatiently into a crosswalk full of 3-year-olds holding hands, and it almost broke my heart. I wanted to throw garbage at that Jeep.) I'm sick of pointing up at that damn walk signal as I look sternly into the driver's eyes like he's a doggie that pooped on the rug. I know it's easy to get impatient in the city; however, not all pedestrians are a-holes. I have the walk signal, and I'm walking, so hold your horses!

ON THE COUCH

Ur-hipster Jack Kerouac and streamlined furniture

Beloved Beatnik

JACK KEROUAC'S LIFE and pen echoed the music from that period in the late 1940s when the improvisational strains of jazz inspired a crazy looseness of being. Along with his hipster, beatnik crew—Allen Ginsberg, William Burroughs and the dangerous, charismatic Neal Cassady—Kerouac careened around the country. They drank, hallucinated, lived sordidly on the muddy edge and, amid illegal acts and wild sex, recklessly married and tossed aside women. (Burroughs actually killed his wife.) But in Jack Kerouac's American Journey, Paul Maher Jr. conveys how the title character, though Kero-wacked, somehow managed to distill the self-absorbed mess into something undeniably lyrical and mythic in his writing. He wanted to convey "the indescribable sad music of the night in America." An allegorical Hooded Wayfarer with a "green glassy visage" seemed to haunt Kerouac, and dreams and visions, along with echoes of the percussive themes of Whitman, Thomas Wolfe, and Dostoevsky's characters, influenced his literary thumbprint. His consciousness streamed out on a 120-foot scroll to become On the Road. Maher, frighteningly, often beautifully, brings this gifted madman to life.

Massachusetts author Paul Maher Jr.'s Jack Kerouac's American Journey follows the Beat Generation.

BO YEAH! Modern design at BoConcept

Minimalist Furniture, Maximum Variation

IT'S AS IF THE LOW-SLUNG sleekness of BoConcept's furniture were designed for human greyhounds. Flexible, aesthetic, fat-free. Sofas here feature "modularity" so you can cleverly reconfigure them, as your space and needs change. You can buy some of the Lego-like pieces at the Cambridge outpost of this chain store. Couch "ingredients," for example, include asymmetrical bits that afford interesting variations on sitting and lying down. This movement invites fluid relationships with your companions: sitting near, sitting far; gazing vis-à-vis; cuddling cozily. Pieces can be extracted to become more conventional chairs or loveseats. Pillows even have a back-booster to alternate angles, or to create squishiness. Low-to-the-floor beds have memory foam, surrounded by a beautifully uncluttered wooden platform. One imagines snoozing monks. Clean, understated "wall systems" of wood and frosted glass contain and recess possessions with equally cool tidiness. Their drawers close in a whooshy smoothness called "blue motion." Wide, shiny black coffee tables, abstract wiry sculptures and understated fabrics exude BoConcept's pervasive aura of clean purity.

Question for Izabel Goulart, Victoria's Secret supermodel

What four lingerie items should every woman own?

1. A sexy bra for when you want to feel glamorous.
2. A great everyday bra—one that gives the perfect cleavage but is also smooth and super-comfortable.
3. An assortment of fun, flirty panties, such as the Sexy Little Things heart cheeky panty.
4. A super-sexy fragrance—one that makes you feel confident in your lingerie.

Goulart visited Boston for the opening of the VS store at the Natick Collection. RICH LEVINE

Beauty

Clip, Clip, Click Your hair requires more finesse than the neighborhood barber can muster, but a chichi salon leaves you feeling less than manly. High Street, a fuss-free space on Newbury that caters exclusively to men, offers premium grooming in an environment which can only be described as bachelor chic. In addition to the black leather chairs and chrome fittings, each station is outfitted with a personal plasma TV. With remote in hand and speakers overhead, you'll want to kick back. Helping you further relax, a neck-and-shoulder massage comes with the High Street Standard suite of services (shampoo, conditioning, hot towel, cut and style: $52). Pressed for time? Arthur, Norman, Kevin and Karl—two pairs of twins—run the family dairy farm, and they recently sent Karl to France to learn the cheese-making business. Back in Westport, the brothers handcraft five flavors of their bell-shaped cow's milk curds in small batches. The resulting grassy-sweet, aged goat–like fromage pops easily from your hand to your mouth. It's also perfect in a salad or a mushroom cap for melting, served with a glass of rosé. Locals take to tapas restaurant

FOR SOMEONE DIAGNOSED with the aptly named (and extremely rare) disorder known as Stiff Person Syndrome, chef Jerome Picca showed unusual flexibility when it came to hiring his kitchen staff for the recently opened Small Plates Restaurant, Tapas & Wine Bar in Harvard Square.

An anthropologist and a physicist, each pondering a career change, each "passionate, ambitious and dedicated," have joined a team that is "absolutely obsessed with the details," says Picca. Details such as his garnish policy: "We never repeat the garnish; chervil or fried basil leaf will be on only one dish per table," he vows.

Cambridge chef Jerome Picca

Out in the dining room, he says, "I insist that the silver is one inch from the base of the table. I insist on no thumbs on the plate when the waitstaff serves." Perfection is the goal, but "you never reach perfection," he acknowledges, even after 30 years in the business and a stint cooking with renowned chef Susan Spicer in New Orleans.

On the road to perfection—a road made bumpier by his chronic symptoms of muscular rigidity and spasms—Picca focuses on providing a seasonally changing menu of dishes, such as nut-crusted duck breast with Dijon molasses and fig compote, in a warm and welcoming setting that's already a hit with the locals.

"My gosh, after a month and a half, we had regulars coming in two or three times a week!" he says. Word is out that the food is delicious, the prices are reasonable and the owner, who runs the former Conundrum space with his wife Stephanie Rossi-Picca, is one of the nicest, friendliest guys in the business.

RAISE YOUR GLASS

To Clink and its shareable small plates

A SENSE OF ADVENTURE comes with eating at a restaurant that used to house convicted felons. Various prison themes sprang to mind as I made my way into the Liberty Hotel's stunning lobby to meet my dining partner, 51 Lincoln chef/owner Jeff Fournier. Waiting at the bar, Jeff looked ready for a night out; he'd worked every evening for the last four weeks trying to get his newly acquired side project, Vintage in West Roxbury, up to speed while also putting the finishing touches on his soon-to-open catering business, Citrio in Newton. His experience cooking contemporary American cuisine would give us insight into executive chef Joseph Margate's small-plate menu at Clink.

We got to the task by ordering a drink. Jeff marveled at the lobby's vaulted, 16-story ceiling and its open layout. An after-work crowd and road-weary (but well-dressed) travelers mingled over stiff cocktails like the Painkiller, a potent mix of Maker's Mark and Pama pomegranate liqueur ($17). Jeff recommended the Trimbach Riesling ($18) for me. The wines come in four sizes, and I ordered a 250 ml. glass, which is about a glass and a half. Jeff had a Bombay Sapphire and tonic.

Inside Clink, a black-clad hostess led us through the dining room and into the last "cell."

With the back room to ourselves, we felt a little like inmates but the autumnal tones and blonde wood tables helped lighten up the space. Jeff's a painter, so his eyes were drawn to the room's design. He liked the brick and the prison bars (several were left intact); we both agreed they could have used more artwork on the walls. "It's still a little unfinished," he observed.

After a quick introduction from our server, we plunged into the menu. It's divided into snacks, cheese, charcuterie, to share and mains, but really, they're all meant to be shared. Jeff was into it. He used to be executive chef at the now-closed Sophia's where all he served were small plates. "It's such a great way to eat," he said. "It becomes the entertainment for the evening."

BE SEEN The lobby's bar has buzz—and pre-dinner drinks.

We kicked things off with a bottle of Shinas Estate's "the Innocent," an Australian viognier ($48) which had a light, fruity edge and played a nice foil to the fromage that promptly arrived. Margate has culled a solid selection of cheeses. The mild Vermont Bayley Hazen blue ($5) was complemented by a cube of quince paste while the semihard Fiddlehead Tomme ($5) from New Hampshire sat beside a dollop of fig jam.

I chose the charcuterie: prosciutto di San Daniele ($12), Spanish chorizo ($12), and foie gras torchon with candied kumquats and buttered toast points ($19). The portions were huge; our favorite was the foie gras, creamy and lightly salted, which melted easily over the toast.

Parsnip soup

Beet salad

Braised lamb shank

From the "to share" section, we tried the crab and citrus salad ($14). It was a stunning dish but the juicy chunks of grapefruit cried out for fresh crab meat instead of the canned shreds that arrived. Our parsnip soup drizzled with pumpkinseed oil ($9) was a hit. "[It] really tastes like parsnip," said Jeff. The beet salad ($10), sliced into thin red and yellow discs and dotted with goat cheese, was a simple, elegant balance of flavors.

Jeff was surprised to find only five main dishes on the list. We picked out the plump, seared sea scallops served on a bed of Savoy cabbage and smoked ham hocks ($23), which was a little oversweetened with a Riesling sauce. We both dug the braised lamb shank ($26); tender on the bone, it came with an aromatic sauce and Brussels sprouts.

Having overdone it on the savory side, we only had room for a small bite of the tarte tatin ($8), which had a flaky crust and hit the sweet spot. As we drank down the last of our wine, we agreed that the lock-up theme was well played and perfectly understated. Although most of Clink's notoriety still comes from its past, with a few steps in the right direction, we're certain it could have a breakout future. ✖✖✖

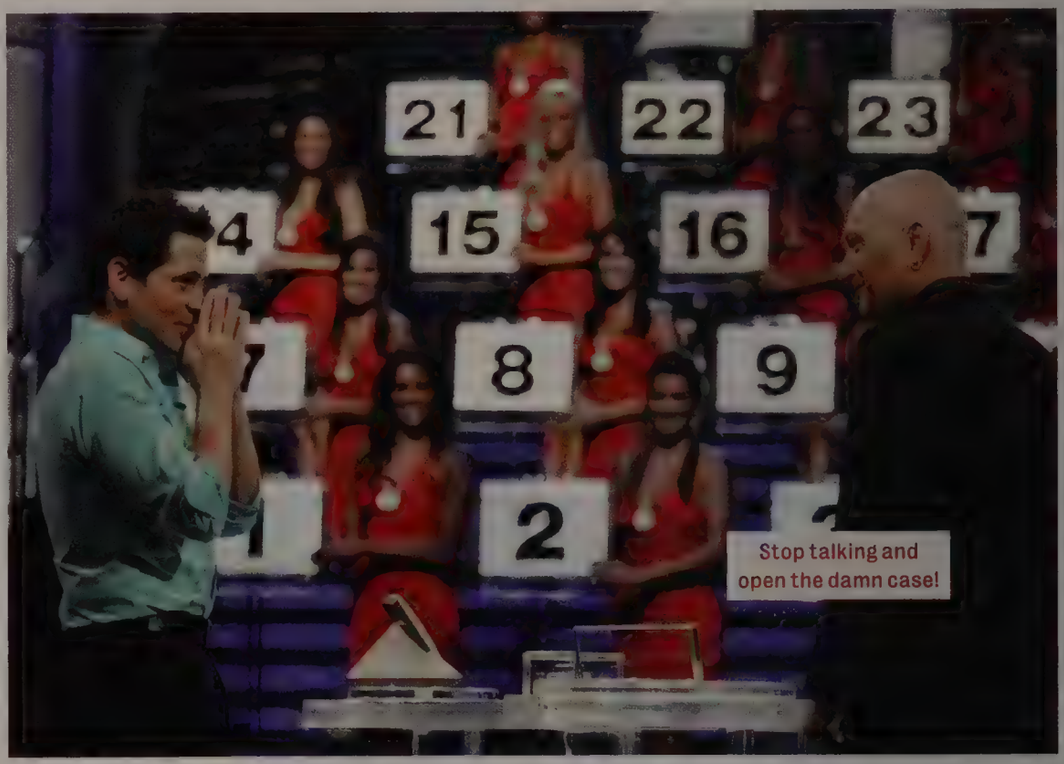
LIFE'S A PITCH

A few shows I'd like to watch until the writers get back to work

AS I SIT HERE, the Hollywood writer's strike is still in effect, and while it may be resolved by the time you read this, the damage is already done. The LA Times Web site has a discussion board under the headline, "TiVorexia Hits the Coasts: Episode and Show Stockpiles at Dangerous Lows." Programs that wouldn't have seen the screen without the strike are returning like bad hookups—I'm waiting for Fox to bring back Drive. And even if the strike ends today, it'll be some time before the popular shows return. Since I haven't been spending my evenings watching favorite programs like 24 and According to Jim, I've had time to consider my own ideas for a few unscripted shows that could be hastily produced to fill out the schedule. In no particular order, then, here's what you'll be watching once I become a Hollywood producer.



Celebrity AeroBed Frustration Challenge
Teams of celebrities compete to pack deflated AeroBeds back into their nylon carrying sacks, which somehow appear to have shrunk five percent over the course of the night, even though the damn beds came out of the same damn bags and seemed to fit just fine before. Will it be too late when Corey Haim and Warren G finally realize they need to roll from the opposite side of the air release valve, or they'll just keep ending up with a big air bubble?

How'd Chelsea Clinton Babe Out?
This isn't really a show concept, I'm just wondering. I mean, have you seen Chelsea Clinton lately? How'd Chelsea Clinton become attractive when she looked like a tree frog as a kid? Either a) she had the most severe awkward years in human history or b) she made a discreet visit to Dr. 90210. My money's on c) both.

Danny Bonaduce Reacts in an Inappropriately Excessive Manner
You know how if you use a florescent light bulb and an incandescent on the same circuit, it takes the florescent one a second longer to come on when you flip the light switch? And you know how as soon as you remove your iPod headphones, they become a knotted pile of white-corded vermicelli that'll need untangling the next time you go to the gym? Watch as minor annoyances like these send Danny Bonaduce into criminally destructive rages.

Programs that wouldn't have seen the screen without the strike are returning like bad hook-ups.

Reading Over Some Guy's Shoulder on the T
A first-person reality show that takes the viewer inside the mind of someone who didn't bring anything to read on the T. Is this guy ever gonna turn the page? Seriously. Did he fall asleep or does he really not know how to read and he's just pretending? If he doesn't turn the page, we're going to move next to the lady reading the Michaels crafts flyer.

Deal or No Deal Models Artificially Prolong the Drama in Other Aspects of Their Lives
There's nothing better than when Howie Mandel tells a Deal or No Deal model to open the case, and instead she starts talking to the contestant and generally inserting herself into the action for so long that by the time she opens the case, the banker has fallen asleep and Howie's head has five o'clock shadow. In this reality spin-off, camera crews follow DOND models on their daily routines. In Episode 1, Tamara bakes a cake and nearly burns down her apartment after spending a half-hour asking her dinner guests if they'd like her to open the oven and take it out. Also, a pregnant Elsa suffers complications when, two months after her due date, she's still chatting up the doctors and wishing them luck in extracting the baby.

Would You Rather?
The popular party game of often-disgusting hypothetical questions comes to life. For $100,000, WOULD YOU RATHER… roll down a staircase, naked, wrapped in a carpet filled with thorns and table salt and lemon juice… OR!… make out with your grandmother? WOULD YOU RATHER… wrestle (naked, of course) with a guy who weighs 1,000 pounds, after he's somehow run a marathon and not showered… OR!… fly through O'Hare on Thanksgiving weekend? We're about to find out! [Note: If successful, Would You Rather might spawn other drinking game–derived spin-offs, such as I Never and WBAT: Whose Boobs Are These?] Hosted by Dan Rather. ✖✖✖

THE TESTOSTER-ZONE

The dumb gene and other reasons women have trouble with men.

I HAVE HEARD THIS LINE from a variety of female friends: "My girlfriends and I are great. What's the matter with guys today? It seems that every man I'm interested in is either married or gay."

What's the matter with guys? Let me tell you a few stories about men that lend credence to my endless feelings about the absurdity of life and underscore why women would complain to me. Have you ever seen a TV ad featuring a husband and wife where the man was not portrayed as an inept idiot? Have you ever seen a beer ad, or sitcom, where men don't act like adolescents? I got a Christmas card from a married man in his 40s. He and his wife had four boys, yet his card featured a snapshot of him as a high school hotshot fullback, blasting his way through an opposing line. What about the rest of the family?

A U.S. senator, whom you all know, bullied a younger boy when he was in prep school. With a few football buddies, he caught the boy in a phone booth and turned the booth around to face a wall. The door could not be opened. The boy, sobbing, was not freed until morning. Another senator, whom you also know, was a member of a college society whose rituals included wrestling naked with other members in attendance.

Boston's funniest male judge was similarly welcomed into his college humor magazine. Part of the routine involved pouring enough grain alcohol and orange juice into the initiates to force them to vomit, much to the glee of the staff. The judge-to-be felt proud that he never got sick and, after two hours of sleep, got up to attend class. He was also pleased that he rose early enough to go through the breakfast line. He was fine until he reached the toaster. When his toast popped up, it triggered subliminal thoughts and he popped up as well, becoming violently ill. At his wedding, some years later, his ushers gave him a silver-plated toaster, which sits to this day on a front hall table.

My own house is not exempt. I had a screaming match with my eldest son when he insisted on participating in a demonstration—a march on the Seabrook, N.H., nuclear site to protest nuclear arms proliferation. I maintained that he didn't know a nuclear site from a Jello shot. And it melted down from there. It turned out that he was being initiated into many things by a radical young woman. But, I guess, a guy has to take big actions for his lady.

My younger son, while walking home through the Public Garden one winter, noticed a woman on the other side of the pond and yelled to her, "I can walk on water for you. Wait for me." As she watched, he stepped onto the ice, went a few steps and then plunged up to his waist in the frigid water. The woman walked on, laughing. Ridicule is the greatest ego insult.

When he arrived home and shared the story, I replied, "Look, our whole family somewhere got the dumb gene, and you have to pay attention to it. Every time you're about to do something risky, different or unusual, ask yourself, 'Is the dumb gene about to kick in?' Then at least you'll second-guess it." I also reminded him of his brother's Seabrook sit-in. He thought for a minute and said, "But, Dad. Both of these stories are about love." I explained that there are times when you think it's love, but it's really the dumb gene.

When I'm looking for guidance of my own, I'll visit a friend I call "the Monk," who works in an office but imagines himself having big thoughts on a mountaintop.

"What about men and women?" I asked him.

The Monk answered: "Women look at men through a microscope, and men look at women through a telescope."

The Collins Card { CHRIS COLLINS }

CLEMENS FACES THE HEAT

The baseball player runs from drug charges. Bad move.

THE FASCINATION with performance-enhancing drugs has reached the point where a lot of average Joes believe they could have pitched their way to 354 victories if they had only taken that magic HGH. I've said it before and I'll say it again: Professional sports isn't a different world; it's a different universe. It's all about the money, and with that comes temptation. When athletes know that $100 million is waiting for them if they put up big numbers, well, health and morality are less than afterthoughts. The problem is, now they're getting caught.

The Mitchell Report—the 409-page document exposing baseball's obsession with steroids and human growth hormone—was supposed to be the first step in the detox process. It showed that the current drug-testing program has no teeth. It can't test for HGH, and the players often know when the testing is coming. The report didn't tell us anything we didn't already suspect. We knew many stars were juicing. All you had to do was look at the numbers and the records that aren't as sacred as they used to be. But there was one name that caught the country's interest: Roger Clemens.

According to the report, Clemens took some needles in the butt while in Toronto. In response, he pulled a Bill Clinton with a stiff prepared statement. It was droning, dull and, quite frankly, I don't know that anybody bought it.

Now don't get me wrong, I was a major proponent of bringing Clemens back to Boston to close out his career. I'm a sucker for happy endings. I figured it would be great for us to finally bury the hatchet thrown by Dan Duquette and for Clemens to finish his remarkable run where it began. But now the Boston sports legend has become the poster boy for steroids and cheating in America's pastime.

The problem is that Major League Baseball has a vested, financial interest in statistics. Clemens is one of only four pitchers with 4,000-plus career strikeouts. He's won two more Cy Youngs than any other pitcher in history. Before the Mitchell Report, Clemens was arguably the greatest right-hander ever.

> Clemens has a lot of fans out there who are waiting patiently for the truth.

So what to do with this baseball icon who has denied all these allegations? I have to admit, I want to believe his denials. But I don't. In fact, I'm starting to turn on him just like I turned on Barry Bonds.

Yet I'm not one of those holier-than-thou guys who says Clemens isn't a Hall of Famer. First of all, these substances weren't on baseball's banned substance list. I wonder why? Maybe it's because no one had a problem when Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa resurrected the game after the 1994 strike. I remember the All-Star weekend at Fenway in 1999 like it was yesterday.

That Home Run Derby, to this day, is one of the most exciting sporting events I've ever been to. Steroids or not, that won't change. I'll always remember the electricity of that night.

In my mind, what's done is done. I accepted Andy Pettitte's apology about using HGH. He didn't waste any time hemming and hawing, and I believe his reputation won't be as severely tarnished because of it.

We had a similar case right here in New England with Rodney Harrison. He accepted his four-game suspension, obviously embarrassed, but didn't run from the charges. I don't think anybody despises the guy around here. I certainly still love him.

Clemens should learn from the great Patriots leader. If he took performance-enhancing drugs, now is the time to make amends. We won't forget, but we can forgive.

Clemens has lots of fans out here who are waiting patiently for the truth. He's backed into a corner because he feels he has so much to lose. By being frank and honest, he may be able to keep his dignity. ✖✖✖

3 Thoughts on the NFL Playoffs

Manning Up... What we'd give for a tape of Peyton's congratulatory phone call to Eli after the younger Manning's Giants upset the Cowboys. "No, seriously, Eli. I'm so proud of you." (Takes swig of wine cooler, glances down at last year's Super Bowl ring and cries like a baby.)

Romo Is Burning... Blame the Cowboys' collapse on Tony Romo's trip to Mexico if you want (just don't tell T.O.). But how about blaming something a little more tangible, like the fact that the guy just isn't a top-notch QB yet?

Rock Me Gently, Rock Me Slowly... Now that the song is stuck in your head, let's agree that this commercial needs to die. We'd rather listen to Rosie O'Donnell and Gilbert Gottfried debate tax reform than have to watch that merry band of animals again. CBS, please make it stop.

5 CELTICS STORY LINES

I Want My Big Baby Back, Baby Back
There's officially no reason for Glen Davis to play fewer than 15 minutes a game. Sure, he'll experience some growing pains on the court, but name a guy in the rotation other than the PGA Tour's members and James Posey who isn't guilty of that. And speaking of Growing Pains... Boner. That is all.

Everybody Loves Ray ▸
The more we watch, the more we're convinced Ray Allen's health will eventually be the difference between the C's being a very good team and the best squad in the East. We knew he had skills, but when he's right, Ray's deadlier than we ever imagined. (Side note: Let's all agree to cease any He Got Game references. They stopped being funny in September.)

Technically Speaking
Kobe Bryant, Amare Stoudemire, Rasheed Wallace, Jermaine O'Neal and Kendrick Perkins: The first four have all led their conference in technical fouls at some point over the last five seasons. The fifth guy is currently leading the East and sticks out on this list like a Bobby Kielty afro. Perk needs to spend a little more time on that masterful jump hook and a little less running his mouth.

Good Charlotte
What would be worse than the Celtics drawing the Bobcats in the first round of the playoffs? Answer: Beating the Bobcats, and then getting the Wizards in the second round. And while we're asking questions, could we be any further ahead of ourselves right now?

State of the City
Did you ever think the Celtics would have 30 wins before February, and there'd be nothing even remotely negative to say? Just another reminder of the sick sports world we live in, where our main cause of pain is that (heading into the Chargers game) it's been over a month since the Pats have covered a spread.

2 POSSIBLE SUPER BOWL PREVIEWS

The Packers Just when you thought the Pats couldn't get any more villainous, here comes the most beloved quarterback in NFL history. He was almost forced into retirement last spring, but now he's got one more shot at glory and the most dramatic ending an NFL career has ever seen. And look who's standing in his way.

The Giants Here are the only four words you need to know. Eli. Manning. Super. Bowl. Take the Pats and the points and watch history unfold. You'll be a richer man.

BOOK RECOMMENDATION

We're a little late on this one, but it was just released in paperback a couple months ago so it's still worth a mention. If The Blind Side, by Michael Lewis, isn't at the top of your to-read list, put it there now. Just an amazing sports story, all the way through.

4 DATES TO WATCH

1/25 The 2007-08 Celtics host the 2006-07 Celtics, also known as the Timberwolves. Ever wonder what the C's record would be right now if Garnett and Al Jefferson switched places (and all the other pieces stayed the same)? We say KG's good for about 10 wins, and at least one extra round in the playoffs.

1/31 Yet another big test for Big Green as Dallas comes to Boston. The C's haven't beaten the Mavs since December 2003, which was coincidentally also the last time Doc Rivers called a timeout.

2/3 Super Bowl XLII. You've got to feel good about the Patriots' chances here, but just in case, we're taking donations to preemptively put a hit on Mercury Morris. He's the only thing that could make a Pats loss any harder to swallow.

2/4 The 56th annual Beanpot tournament gets under way at the Garden, marking the first time this many college students were in one place since last Saturday at the Foggy Goggle.

"They were trying to make me look all JFK Jr. with those dark dye jobs."

Soroff On ERIC MABIUS

The Ugly Betty star on sexy costars and spiky hair

ERIC MABIUS PLAYS DANIEL MEADE OPPOSITE America Ferrera and Vanessa Williams on the frothy ABC hit Ugly Betty. Born in Pennsylvania, Mabius, 36, moved extensively as a child but graduated from Amherst Regional High School before attending Sarah Lawrence. After parts in small off-Broadway productions, he landed his first film role in the indie flick Welcome to the Dollhouse, which took top honors at Sundance. Since then, he has done more than 25 films and a dozen TV projects, including Resident Evil, The OC, The L Word and Cruel Intentions. He lives in Malibu with his wife, Ivy Sherman, and their son, Maxwell.

Jonathan Soroff: Is America Ferrera ugly in real life? You can tell us.
Eric Mabius: Absolutely not. I think there was a lot of worry the first season that she was too pretty. She's definitely not one of those Hollywood actresses who goes to the gym and looks at herself in the mirror all the time, but they put her in five layers of clothes to make her look pudgy.

So what we see is all artifice?
Yeah. Did you see her on the cover of W? She's absolutely gorgeous. She's not one of those women who's a two at 10 and a 10 at two [i.e., ugly at 10 pm but looking good at last call].

Are you a natural redhead?
[Laughs.] No, I'm not.

So the drapes don't match the curtains?
That's just the result of previous hair departments that have long since been fired for doing poor dye jobs. They were trying to make me look all JFK Jr. with those dark dye jobs.

Most embarrassing moment as an actor?
Oh, God, I've definitely stuck my foot in it over the years. But this is a good one: I was on The View last year, and I'd gotten some bad shrimp the night before and I felt completely sick. I sit down, and it's all screaming women in the audience, and the women on the show all bombard me with questions at the same time. If you happen to get ahold of that interview—I think it's on YouTube—the first question I answer, I kinda tilt my head down, and I almost threw up. I literally had to swallow back vomit. When you watch, it looks like I'm being thoughtful, but I'm actually swallowing things back so I can answer the question.

PHOTOGRAPH BY Tatiana Bottom

Nice! So are actors especially gifted sexually?
They're gifted at pretending like they're especially gifted. We're better than the average person at pretending.

Ever treat a woman as cavalierly or as disrespectfully as you do on the show?
Never. I went to [formerly all-female] Sarah Lawrence College, so it was this odd universe for a guy, with three times as many women. You had your pick of stunning, talented, remarkable women, but they'd generally break up with you before you had a chance to break up with them.

You were born in Pennsylvania but raised here. Steelers or Patriots?
Patriots. Definitely.

So why The L Word instead of Queer as Folk?
'Cause it's the right kind of plumbing.

Who was your secret cast crush?
I always and still do have a huge crush on Jennifer Beals.

Is that from the Flashdance days?
No, no. She's more beautiful now than she ever was back then.

Did you have a poster of her?
No. I usually had one or several posters of the Charlie's Angels girls.

Did you ever have the satin-covered Farrah Fawcett pillow?
I didn't even know they existed. A whole generation probably lost their virginity to those pillows.

OK, now back to the lesbians: Do you get the straight guy fantasy about two women together?
Sure! Double your pleasure, double your fun! I think that kind of porn is much more appealing because dudes are nasty. I don't want to watch porn that has dude parts in it.

What were you like in high school?
I wasn't really the outsider so much as the guy who just did his own thing. I was on the junior national luge team, and I'd leave in the winter to train in Europe, and when I was back in school, I was doing theater.

Role you're most proud of?
Probably my involvement in Ugly Betty. They're writing in such a complex way. But Welcome to the Dollhouse definitely got my foot in the door, so I'm very proud to have been a part of that film, too.

Most ridiculous thing you ever did to get a part?
Well, along the way you learn to lie very well, so I'd go in and they'd say, "Can you ride a horse?" and I'd say, "Yes, of course."

Who would you want to do a nude scene with?
I'm gonna leave that one alone. Getting to pretend to sleep with Salma Hayek and Lucy Liu, though—I've had a pretty good run of it so far.

What rhymes with Mabius?
I don't know, but ever since kindergarten, I've gotten "Maybe yes, maybe no."

Biggest red carpet secret?
I'm usually so freaked out that I pretend it's not a big deal and then get ready at the last minute. I'm usually hungover for those things.

That's what Valium's for. So what's the secret to your spiky, spiky hair?
[Laughs.] A really good hairstylist. By the way, I heard there's a bakery down in southern Vermont where you can order a dozen bagels and Valium.

Klonopin lasts longer.
That was the helper of choice in college. There were a lot of wealthy kids, and they'd always be raiding their parents' medicine cabinets in the city and coming back to share the wealth.

You were in Resident Evil. Should all video games be made into movies?
No. Frogger, for instance. Not a good candidate.

Last question. Fill in the blank: Eric Mabius is an actor, but he really wants to _____.
Cut down trees. I love working in the yard. ✖✖✖

Into the Woods

Blindfolded and left in the wilderness, our intrepid reporter confronts nature on his own terms.

I grew up in Maine. And not in a faux-Maine, south-of-Portland yuppie enclave like Cape Elizabeth or Kennebunkport or Freeport. Where I grew up, kids actually traded chipmunk tails at recess (I swear I'm not making that up), and if you brought a six-inch hunting knife to school, that probably just meant it was show-and-tell day. I drank water from a spring that bubbled out of the ground in the middle of the woods. I built shelters from felled trees. I knew that you shouldn't eat rhubarb leaves because they're poisonous. And the incredible thing, in retrospect, is that I wasn't an aspiring Grizzly Adams and had no particular interest in nature or forging an outdoorsman persona. Where I lived, you simply got comfortable with the wilderness because it began at the edge of your yard.

Today, there's a sort of cult fascination with the concept of surviving in those threatening reaches of the planet where there are no 7-Elevens and Wi-Fi access is spotty. TV shows like Man vs. Wild and Survivorman provide a glimpse into the romanticized world of the roughneck soul who knows how to tie knots, forage for food and engage in hand-to-paw combat with God's other creatures. Now, unlike Bear Grylls, I don't think that I could choke down a mouthful of maggots with a chaser of my own pee, but neither would I weep in fear and despair if I found myself alone in a murky glen, staring eye to eye with a belligerent raccoon. I'd probably try to follow that raccoon back to its dam and then eat its eggs.

Because of my upbringing as a NARD (North American Rural Dweller), the editors of the Improper thought it might make fine sport to put my skills to the test with a manly challenge: They would confiscate my cell phone, blindfold me and drive me to an undisclosed location, where I'd be dropped off and left with a set of challenges—chief among them that I find my way out of the wilderness and back to the office. My ego thought this a great way to prove that city living hasn't diminished my manly woodsman skills, while another part of my brain wondered whether perhaps my coworkers really just don't like me very much. Maybe, if I made it back, they'd propose a follow-up story where I'm left on a leaky raft in the middle of the ocean. But before I can fully ponder the ramifications of my assignment, I'm blindfolded and thrown into a car for my journey into the woods.

Get My Bearings

I remove my mask to find myself standing on an icy trail that meanders up a slope between two rocky escarpments. I don't know where I am, but I guess the area must be reasonably devoid of fellow human beings; otherwise the sight of a guy being led blindfolded into the woods might've prompted a few alarmed phone calls to the local constabulary.

I'm not without supplies. In addition to a list of challenges, my tormentors provided me with a bag of tools they deemed useful to a man marooned in the wild. I eagerly open it up to find what goodies I'll have at my disposal to help effect my escape. Rescue flares? A Marlin lever-action 30-30 rifle, perhaps? Even a Luna bar would be nice. I know they're for girls, but they're delicious. Instead, I find that my supplies consist of, in descending order of usefulness: A key chain compass, a bottle of Jack Daniels Tennessee whiskey and the January 2008 issue of Playboy.

In addition to a list of challenges, my tormentors provided me with a bag of tools they deemed useful to a man marooned in the wild.

Apparently, the organizers of this little adventure have confused "Items useful for survival in the wilderness" with "Items useful for survival in prison." I also have a copy of the Worst-Case Scenario Survival Handbook, which is entertaining if not particularly germane to my predicament (assuming that my trip back to the office doesn't at some point require hotwiring an older GM car or escaping quicksand). Worst-case scenario, I can use the Worst-Case Scenario handbook to start a fire.

I pull out my list of challenges.

Commune With Nature

I'm not sure how one communes with nature. Do I get naked and make snow angels? Do I have a meaningful heart-to-heart conversation with a squirrel? I don't know, but thinking about it sure makes me thirsty, so I decide to take care of that issue first. The melting snow has furnished this trail with an enticing little stream of runoff, so I lie prone on the ice and take a sip. Not bad. However, as soon as I drink the water I begin imagining all the horrible organisms that might be swimming around inside it, as well as the unspeakable things that are probably going on just out of my sight upstream. Probably, at the top of the hill, there's a stately elk relieving itself. I break out the Jack and follow my hydration with a blazing gush of whiskey, which everyone knows will kill malaria right along with your ability to accurately judge female attractiveness. Jack Daniels is the wilderness man's Brita.

I lie prone on the ice and take a sip. Not bad. I follow my hydration with whiskey.

I decide that if I'm going to commune with nature, first I need to know how to get out of it, which takes me to my next challenge: figuring out where they've left me.

Climb a Tree

This isn't technically on my list, but climbing a tree will serve the dual purpose of establishing my location and allowing me to sharpen my tree-climbing skills, which I haven't worked on in some time. I choose a sturdy-looking evergreen near the top of the hill that looks as if its upper branches should provide a view over the surrounding foliage. As I wend my way up through the lower ones I find that my grip is excellent, thanks to copious amounts of sap that will later prove nigh impossible to remove. I guess climbing a tree is like riding a bike—great fun until you fall. Also, easy to remember how to do.

From the top of my perch, high enough that I'd definitely regret it if I fell, I can see the forest open up before me and in the distance… Boston. Based on my perspective of the city, I'm north. Based on the duration of my blindfolded car ride out here, I must be in Stoneham or perhaps Medford. I climb down and begin to trudge through the snow in the general direction of civilization.

Find Lunch, Part 1

On Man vs. Wild, Bear Grylls is always finding a snack in the most unlikely places—under rocks, in trees, inside dead camels. But his go-to move, the one that always seems to furnish him with a nibble or two of what he calls "protein" and the rest of us call "squirming bundles of stomach parasites," is to dig around in a rotten log. To Bear Grylls, rotten logs are a McDonald's drive-thru. So I whip out my trusty pocketknife-with-fork attachment and begin rooting around in a dead log.

I quickly start to wonder if Bear Grylls' logs are preloaded with maggots and insects by his producers, the way fishing ponds are stocked with trout. Every log I open is filled not with a smorgasbord of delicacies but with more rotten wood. And honestly, it's hard to get too disappointed.

Every log I open is filled not with a smorgasbord of delicacies but with more rotten wood.

After striking out on the creepy-crawly hors d'oeuvres, I decide to take a different tack on securing sustenance. About a quarter-mile down the hill is a pond, and while I don't have much of a craving for live termites, some fresh sushi would set me right. Only one problem: The pond is frozen. And I have no fishing gear. And there are probably no fish in a pond this small anyway. Wait, that's more than one problem. Must be the low blood sugar.

Find Lunch, Part 2

I trudge out to a likely spot on the pond and begin boring a hole in the ice with my trusty blade. It's slow going, as the hole keeps filling with slush and water, which needs to be scooped out with my pocketknife's spoon attachment. Soon the hole is as deep as the blade on the knife, and I need to keep widening it to dig deeper. Finally, after much fruitless scraping, the hole fills with water. I'm in.

I've gone ice fishing many a time in Maine, so I know exactly what to do once I've got my hole: Crack open the booze. As far as I can tell, that's the traditional procedure for luring fish out from under the ice. You sit next to the hole, getting hammered and arguing about who has the fastest snowmobile, until you pass out and forget that you were doing something as stupid as sitting next to a hole in the ice and trying to catch a fish when you could've just gone to Shaw's and bought one.

I know exactly what to do once I've got my hole in the ice: Crack open the booze.

After a few pulls on the JD, I sharpen a stick and pass the time intermittently jabbing it down into the water in the hopes that I'll happen to spear the unluckiest fish ever. While I'm doing this, a spider alights on my jacket and begins rappelling down to the water, prompting me to wonder if spiders, or indeed spider webs, are edible. This is the kind of naturalist query I'd never before considered, so I think we can cross off "Commune With Nature," even if "Find Lunch" is a bit of a fiasco.

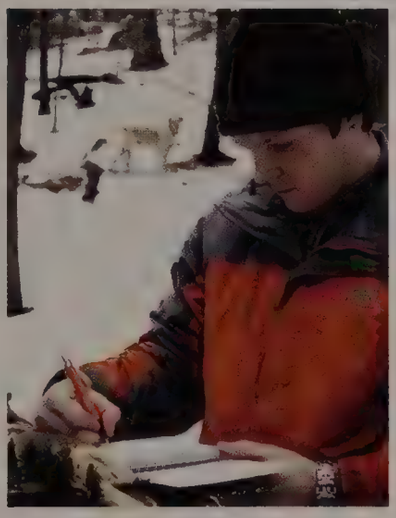
Compose an Ode to Nature

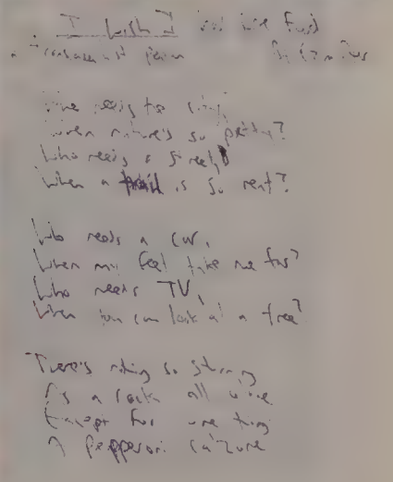
I once had to write a transcendentalist poem for a high-school English class. Everyone went outside and sat in the middle of the track field and attempted to channel Ralph Waldo Emerson. At the end of class, we read our works to one another, and while I don't remember my entire poem, I do remember that it included the lines "Look at the sky / It goes up real far / I like to protect it / I fart in a jar." I'm quite sure my teacher was flabbergasted at how quickly I grasped the basic tenets of transcendentalism.

I'm still not much of a poet. I sit on a log and try to think deep thoughts, but I'm starting to get concerned about making it out of here before dark. A short distance away in the woods, there's a strange platform constructed of branches lashed between two trees and covered with sticks. I can't tell for sure whether it's supposed to be a crude shelter, a tremendously uncomfortable bed, or some kind of shrine to the god of the bloodthirsty, cave-dwelling Morlocks who built it. Either way, I don't intend to stick around long enough to find out.

I sit on a log and try to think deep thoughts, but I'm starting to get concerned about making it out of here before dark.

I rush out a stupid little poem about how nature is swell but I'd prefer some food. Whatever. I suspect that this requirement is something of a red herring anyway, intended to gauge my devotion to my real mission. You don't see Bear Grylls writing poems, unless you count drinking the warm blood of a rattlesnake as a kind of performance piece.





Challenge 6

Make My Way Back to the Office

I'm for survival at all costs.

This is the point where my quest turns from Survivorman into a game that the photographer, Alan, spontaneously dubs "The Hobo Joe Adventure." Once I stumble out onto a street, I've gone from wilderness survival to urban vagrant. I spy a discarded baggie of Gummi Bears and briefly consider trying a few before realizing that eating someone else's Gummi Bears is probably grosser than eating bugs out of a log. I recognize my location when I follow the noise of traffic and find myself confronted with a giant "Route 93-Medford" sign. So I must have been in the Fells in Medford. I don't know crap about Medford.

Amend that—on my way to go on KISS 108 this very morning, I'd gotten lost in Medford and enlisted my TomTom to take me to the station, which is near the Wellington T stop on the Orange Line. But how to find my way there? Easy. Just call someone.

Before I left the office, I surrendered my cell phone to my editor, Megan. That is, I surrendered my old, decommissioned cell phone. Everyone knows I live my life according to the teachings of Jack Bauer, and Jack Bauer always has a backup weapon hidden on his person. So while the decoy phone sits on Megan's desk, I call my wife and tell her my street location and ask her to plot directions to the nearest T stop. "I don't know," she says. "It looks like there might be a commuter rail, but no T station.... Hold on, I've got another call. I've gotta go." Curses! I should've known better than to forego my own inherently superior sense of direction in favor of assistance from the fairer sex. Forget it. I don't need her help. I'll walk south until I see something I recognize.

As it turns out, this takes quite a while, but after a couple miles I recognize Route 38 from my earlier misguided drive to the radio station. A mile after that, I'm really wishing I wasn't wearing my heavy shitkickers. And a mile after that, I'm at the Wellington stop. Or, more accurately, the Kelly's Roast Beef right outside the Wellington stop. I'll make my triumphant return to the office, but not on an empty stomach. I'm for survival at all costs, and after a day in the woods, $6.75 for a large roast beef sandwich seems quite reasonable indeed. ×××

FIRE IN THE HOLE

It's impressive that after all these years, Hell Night at the East Coast Grill hasn't lost any steam. What started out as a dare between chef Chris Schlesinger and his most masochistic customers has become a regular satanic ritual, a fiesta of pain in which searing-hot creations are trooped out to fry the alimentary canals of Boston's most foolhardy diners. Sixteen years after the inaugural ordeal, the bold and the fire-retardant still flock to Inman Square to prove their masculinity (and their lack of nerve-endings) by eating dishes like the Pasta From Hell—a gastronomic blowtorch that leaves strong men mouthing at air like beached goldfish. So popular is the infernal evening that the latest round blazes for three nights, Jan. 28–30.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Atonement ★★★ Director Joe Wright, who helmed 2005's rollicking, dynamic take on Pride and Prejudice, reteams with Keira Knightley, this time to tackle Ian McEwan's epic WWII downer. The first hour suggests we might be in for a masterpiece, as cinematographer Seamus McGarvey's camera restlessly prowls through the English country estate where Knightley's poor little rich girl pines for James McAvoy's hapless gardener. Class resentments simmer; sexual tensions sizzle; and a few tragic misunderstandings hurtle things headlong into disaster. Then along comes that pesky war, and Christopher Hampton's screenplay switches gears into more abstract, literary territory, and these vibrant flesh-and-blood characters recede into symbols. Wright desperately tries to hold our attention with an array of visual trickery, but even a breathtakingly staged, unbroken steadicam shot, winding its way around thousands of extras at the Dunkirk evacuation, can't touch the close-quartered intimacy of those early reels. The final kicker is a purely literary flourish, one that connects in the head but not the heart. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Before the Devil Knows You're Dead ★★★½ Disproving the theory that folks mellow with age, 83-year-old director Sidney Lumet enters his fifth decade of filmmaking with the nastiest, most fatalistic thriller of his career. Philip Seymour Hoffman and Ethan Hawke star as financially strapped brothers who attempt to cover debts by knocking off a suburban jewelry store. It's literally a mom-and-pop operation run by their parents (Albert Finney and Rosemary Harris), which sends this seemingly simple bungled heist perilously close to Greek tragedy. Kelly Masterson's screenplay is a grim puzzle-box that zips back and forth through time to savor the Murphy's Law developments. In lesser hands, this could have been a glib Tarantino clone, but Lumet's austere, unobtrusive style allows his actors plenty of room to run and linger on old familial resentments, which develops an emotional resonance rare for this kind of gimmicky crime flick. As always, Hoffman is brilliant, his closed-off cruelty an excellent foil for Hawke's wounded puppy dog performance. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

The Bucket List ★½ There's not a schmaltzy self-help cliché that doesn't show up somewhere in Justin Zackham's screenplay for this soppy tear-jerker, which stars Jack Nicholson and Morgan Freeman as terminal cancer patients who embark on a wild road trip and learn banal life lessons along the way. No points for guessing that Nicholson's sardonic, loutish billionaire discovers all sorts of wisdom from the sage, salt-of-the-earth Freeman. Why is an actor as dynamic as Freeman so often cast as a healing force of neutered sanctimony? Does anybody remember his terrifying breakthrough performance as a vicious pimp in 1987's Street Smart? The man can do more than nod and teach people how to be good. Director Rob Reiner laughably phones it in, as this alleged globetrotting adventure has quite brazenly been photographed on a Los Angeles soundstage. There hasn't been such shameless use of stock footage and shots of actors in front of fake backgrounds since the late '30s. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Charlie Wilson's War ★★½ It should have been the movie of the year. Begging for pointed satire, the true-life saga of a Texas congressman (Tom Hanks) covertly arming and training the Afghan mujahideen is a ripe example of American victories coming back to bite us on the backside. But, working from a sharp and extremely funny script by West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin (here making amends for his odious Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip), director Mike Nichols chickens out by softening all the body-blows with broad comedic flourishes and abruptly pulling the plug before the logical ending. Still, Hanks is a joy to watch as the debauched do-gooder, bantering back and forth with Philip Seymour Hoffman's movie-stealing CIA crank. Wildly miscast as a voracious millionaire man-eater, Julia Roberts does a lousy Susan Sarandon impression. There are enough meaty moments to make the film almost worthwhile, but it's too bad Nichols pulled so many punches. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Great Debaters ★★½ Everything you'd expect from an Oprah Winfrey production, with Denzel Washington cruising along in that upstanding mode he can probably achieve in his sleep. Washington, who also directed, stars as Texas college prof Melvin Tolson, a firebrand poet and social activist who, in 1935, led his debate team against those snooty Harvard kids. Robert Eisele's screenplay is uplift-by-the-numbers, but there are some lovely moments to be found on the way to the film's preordained conclusion. Forest Whitaker shines as a stern preacher worried about his precocious son (Denzel Whitaker, no relation), while Nate Parker and Jurnee Smollett strike a few sparks as star-crossed teammates. As evidenced by his previous stint behind the lens, 2002's forgettable Antwone Fisher, Washington's directorial skills are rudimentary at best, but this time he indulges his performers enough to make us momentarily forget that we've seen this all before. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.) continued on page 53

THE IMPROPER AWARDS

A salute to sex, cross-dressing and full-frontal nudity

THE WRITER'S GUILD strike put the kibosh on this year's Golden Globe Awards ceremony, and while normally we endorse any telecast in which the on-camera participants are boozing, it's tough to shed a tear over the loss of another evening wasted watching Hollywood pay tribute to itself. Could the Oscars be facing a similar fate? It's too soon to tell, but just in case, we've come up with our own, slightly less proper awards, so nobody goes home empty-handed. continued on next page

BEST FIGHT SCENE
Viggo Mortensen in the bathhouse, Eastern Promises
What's worse: the horrible thwapping sound of wet flesh colliding, or the sick realization that so many knives are in close proximity to so many dangling parts? Director David Cronenberg's creepy, languid and naked spoof on the modern American action scene subversively toys with notions of masculinity (it really is a sausage party) while zeroing in on a full-frontal vulnerability missing from most stunt sequences. Mortensen is letting it all hang out, and the result is nerve-wracking.

BEST CHASE SCENE
Tangier, The Bourne Ultimatum
The game-changing genius of director Paul Greengrass and his ace choreographer, Dan Bradley, can be nailed down by studying the brilliant expanding and shrinking of perspectives during Ultimatum's breakneck second act. A hyperkinetic pursuit through a bustling Middle-Eastern marketplace shifts to empty, expansive rooftops, but as the hunt intensifies, those quarters retract. Bourne and prey move into a cramped apartment, finally burrowing into a shower stall as the hand-to-hand combat erupts with balletic precision. What was once swarming and then vast has become violently up-close and personal. Bourne's eventual triumph is unsatisfying, almost shameful. With its unusually vulnerable hero, this isn't your father's spy movie.

BEST SEX SCENE
Clive Owen and Monica Bellucci, Shoot 'Em Up
Because how often does any hero find time to attend to his costar's needs while simultaneously blowing away a room full of bad guys before pausing for a post-coital double entendre? "Talk about shooting your load." It's a groaner, but well-played.

BEST AFFLECK
Casey
Ben might have finally rescued his floundering reputation, cowriting and directing a sturdy adaptation of Dennis Lehane's Gone Baby Gone, but kid brother Casey didn't just discover his inner badass playing the film's soul-sick leading role. He also stole scenes in other pictures, unionizing a Mexican sweatshop in the otherwise forgettable Ocean's Thirteen and delivering a chilling performance as a lethal celebrity wannabe—think Mark David Chapman a hundred years ahead of schedule—in The Assassination of Jesse James by the Coward Robert Ford.

MOST CONFUSING CASTING
Southland Tales
The incoherence of Richard Kelly's futuristic attempt at social satire was only compounded by his weird fondness for late-night sketch comedy performers. When your psycho-killer racist cop is played by Jon Lovitz, and Cheri

BEST BAD MOVIE
I Know Who Killed Me
Already revived by the Brattle for midnight screenings best appreciated in an altered state, Lindsay Lohan's eerie semiotics experiment has the tabloid diva playing stigmatic twins who feel each other's pain. She's an honors student and a skanky stripper, both hunted by a serial killer. Director Chris Sivertson does a magnificent impression of overcooked '80s Brian De Palma sleazefests by tossing in enough bad symbolism to choke a white horse. Insanely pretentious, but if looked at the right way, a brilliant sequel to Lohan's Parent Trap remake.

WORST BAD MOVIE
Transformers
"It's supposed to be stupid" is not a valid excuse, at least not when slogging through two and a half hours of Michael Bay's typical racist stereotypes, misogynistic objectification and a story that doesn't make a lick of sense no matter how much screen time is devoted to people standing around attempting to explain it. Of course, all we really came to see were giant fighting robots, but unfortunately Bay shot them with a shaky, handheld camera from ground-level obstructed views, making the action so impossible to follow that characters must resort to shouting out status updates.

Day-Lewis delivers one of the great monologues of our lifetime.

BEST BOB DYLAN
Cate Blanchett, I'm Not There
She's got the twitches, the half-coughs, the endless cigarettes and the upended syllables at the end of every sentence. But above all, Blanchett has the smirk. She nails that maybe-kidding grin, the enigmatic Dylanness, as if terribly amused by a private joke you're never going to understand.

WORST BOB DYLAN
Hayden Christensen, Factory Girl
Not content to have played Darth Vader as an adenoidal wuss, this awful young actor set about debasing another American icon by playing Dylan as a humorless scold in George Hickenlooper's mercifully unseen Edie Sedgwick biopic.

BEST OVERACTING
Daniel Day-Lewis, There Will Be Blood
After seething for more than two hours, Daniel Day-Lewis finally hurls himself clear into the stratosphere for one of the great, nutzoid monologues of our lifetime. Just when you think he can't get any more baroque and theatrical in his delivery, Day-Lewis discovers unexpected, noisy inflections and new twisted feats of physicality. When it's all over, he falls back exhausted but musters the energy to spit out, "I'm finished."

So are we. ✖✖✖

I Am Legend ★★★ For a large portion of its running time, director Francis Lawrence's stark and handsomely mounted take on Richard Matheson's oft-filmed novel has a bracing sense of despair and an intelligence uncommon for a mega-budget blockbuster starring Will Smith. The former Fresh Prince dials down his trademark self-regard quite effectively as the sole survivor of a plague that's turned the world's population into sunlight-averse, poorly computer-animated zombies. The real star of the film is New York City, which has never appeared so desolate and empty. There is a stillness that's seriously unnerving. Smith's last man standing is drifting perilously close to dementia, and Lawrence punishes him with carefully crafted, prolonged suspense sequences. The movie is so smart and so dark for so long, you start to wonder when the Hollywood rubbish is going to begin. Then come the explosions and nonsense and pandering speeches about faith. Still, two-thirds of a great movie is better than nothing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Juno ★★ The season's most insufferable dialogue comes courtesy of stripper turned screenwriter Diablo Cody, who penned this unbearably precious tale of teenage pregnancy that's more concerned with glib one-liners and arcane pop culture references than recognizable human emotion. The overqualified cast includes Ellen Page as a precocious and knocked-up 16-year-old, and Superbad's Michael Cera, pricelessly inarticulate as the baby daddy. Dependable character actors JK Simmons, Jason Bateman and Allison Janney wrestle whatever feeling they can out of Cody's one-note smarm, but director Jason Reitman undercuts their efforts with too-cute flourishes and an aura of smug self-satisfaction rivaling that of his similarly over-praised debut, Thank You for Smoking. Juno is already a hit, which is no surprise considering how much it aims to flatter its target audience. Mileage may vary, depending on your tolerance for hipster affectations. Personally, I felt like I was trapped in Allston past my bedtime. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

National Treasure: Book of Secrets ★★ A mostly agreeable bunch of hooey, with Nicolas Cage reprising his role as nerdy adventurer Benjamin Franklin Gates, who drags his dad (Jon Voight), ex-gal pal (Diane Krueger) and annoying sidekick (Justin Bartha) on another improbable Da Vinci Code knock-off through the fictionalized annals of history. The first hour has momentum, with our heroes breaking into Buckingham Palace, the Oval Office and even kidnapping the President (a game Bruce Greenwood) while trying to clear the name of Gates' ancestor, recently implicated in the Lincoln assassination. Helen Mirren and Harvey Keitel join the overcrowded proceedings, which eventually crumble under their own weight once we discover a booby-trapped city of gold hidden inside Mount Rushmore. Eventually wearing out its welcome, National Treasure drags on far too long and boasts too many abysmally staged action sequences. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

No Country for Old Men ★★★★ Adapted from the 2005 novel by Cormac McCarthy, Joel and Ethan Coen's No Country for Old Men is an enthralling, devastating movie experience. Stripped to the bone, it's a model of ruthless narrative efficiency that blossoms into something much larger than the sum of its precision-tooled parts. What at first seems like the simple saga of two tough hombres and a bag of money eventually attains a mythic, almost Biblical grandeur. For days afterwards, it haunts your dreams—the bad ones. The Coens have at last gone back to their roots, infusing No Country with the clockwork meticulousness and parched landscapes of their killer 1984 debut, Blood Simple. The movie is almost unbearably suspenseful and boasts the filmmakers' trademark strain of sicko gallows humor. But there's also something new here: a palpable sense of sorrow and genuine emotional resonance. For the first time in their brilliant career, it finally feels like the merry pranksters are out to do more than crack themselves up. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Savages ★★★½ Grim, funny and unsentimental, writer-director Tamara Jenkins' follow-up to her 1998 dysfunctional-family comedy, Slums of Beverly Hills, stars Philip Seymour Hoffman and Laura Linney as sourpuss siblings facing difficult decisions as their estranged, abusive father (Philip Bosco) heads toward dementia. If you think this is going to be a sweet comedy of familial reconciliation, take another look at that surname. Muted in tone and clad beneath a brilliantly shabby production design, The Savages has a humdrum grit often missing even from indie movies. The more unsavory aspects of contemporary eldercare are confronted in a similarly blunt fashion with a minimum of speechifying. Hoffman and Linney are, as usual, extraordinary. Like most siblings facing a crisis, they fall back into the roles assigned to them in childhood. There's no grand deathbed catharsis and no monologues about lessons learned. When all is said and done, the characters have merely slouched ever so slightly closer to adulthood. The movie feels tough, and true. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street ★★★ This isn't your kid sister's musical. Drenched in rivers of blood, Sweeney Todd is a black-hearted, at times disgustingly comic meditation on the price of vengeance. As luck would have it, Steven Sondheim's gory extravaganza is exactly what director Tim Burton needed to get his groove back. Sweeney Todd is his best picture in years—ghoulishly delightful and subversive. There is a clarity and completeness of vision marking a welcome return to Burton's mischievous Goth sensibility. Johnny Depp stars as the wronged barber who sates his thirst for retribution by slitting the throats of his customers and tossing their corpses into the basement, where his daffy old landlady (played with dizzy deadpan timing by Helena Bonham Carter) grinds up the bodies and bakes them into pies. Depp and Bonham Carter are wonderful, save for one teensy caveat: They can't sing. Burton's swooping, inventive camerawork and the soul-stirring orchestrations too often soar towards transcendence, only to be dragged down by the pedestrian vocalizing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

There Will Be Blood ★★★★ In PT Anderson's austere epic, Daniel Day-Lewis delivers an iconic performance as Daniel Plainview, a black-hearted oilman carving out an empire during the early chapters of the 20th century. Pitted in a decades-long battle of wits against Paul Dano's whimpering, faith-healing hustler, Plainview beats a slow retreat into monstrousness, gaining all the money and power one could possibly imagine while at the same time losing whatever scrap of a soul he had to begin with. A harsh contrast to Anderson's warm, Altman-esque tales of community like Magnolia and Boogie Nights, Blood runs ice cold, with rigorous attention to classic wide-screen compositions and an almost Kubrickian pitilessness. Radiohead guitarist Jonny Greenwood's buzzing, atonal score frays the nerves for over two and a half hours of simmering unease, while Day-Lewis allows his mannerisms and physicality to grow ever more baroque. The film's final, hotly debated and in some circles already legendary scene uncorks a lifetime of Plainview's self-hatred in a seismic, Method-acting eruption. In oilman terms, it's a gusher. (At Coolidge Corner, Harvard Square and West Newton.)

27 Dresses ★★ It's like porn for girls, starring Katherine Heigl as a perpetual bridesmaid with an unrequited crush and a closet full of ghastly frocks. It seems that her slatternly little sister (Cameron Diaz clone Malin Akerman) is about to marry the man of Heigl's dreams (played by Edward Burns with his usual charmless vapidity), and big sis is stuck planning their nuptials. Enter James Marsden's wiseacre wedding columnist, instantly aggravating our heroine to such an extent that their hooking-up is all but inevitable. Sloppily directed by former choreographer Anne Fletcher, it's a ramshackle contraption designed to push all the chick-flick buttons. Chock full of scenes that don't quite connect, Aline Brosh McKenna's screenplay feels a couple of drafts away from being finished. Heigl makes a sympathetic lead, and the flinty Marsden offers some much-needed energy, but the rest of the production is amateur hour, complete with recognizable Providence locations awkwardly doubling for Manhattan. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

FEW POP ARTISTS project as flamboyant a musical personality as Mika, who brings his jubilant showmanship to the Orpheum Feb. 1. So it's hard to believe the Beirut-born, London-bred singer virtually stopped speaking when he was 11.

"I'm very dyslexic, and I happened to be in a school with a teacher who really didn't understand that," says Mika, 24, born Michael Penniman to a Lebanese mother and American father. "There really wasn't any way out for me. I could either completely go mental and aggressive about this or I could give up and hide in the background. And I decided to hide."

But after several months of home-schooling, Mika returned to class. "I would never hide again," he says, although the other kids bullied him over his colorful fashion sense. He says that singing gave him a sense of worth, and he began studying with an opera teacher, ending up on the stage of the Royal Opera House. "She tried to teach me how to play the piano, and she realized that I couldn't read music. But she could play the line on the piano and I'd sing it back to her."

It's all paid off for Mika. His 2007 debut Life in Cartoon Motion became an international smash in the wake of "Grace Kelly," a single whose lines "Should I bend over, should I look older, just to be put on the shelf?" were a slap at record executives who dismissed his music early on.

"I tried to change and to manipulate myself a little bit," Mika says from his London home, "and I ended up 10 times worse than I was before. When a person is different, the only thing that will make them look more like a freak is when they try and dress up as a normal person.... I'd rather just be myself."

Sure, Mika favors wearing tuxedo shirts, sharp pants and suspenders. Yet his fashion can pale next to his music: danceable pop-rock often painted in colors as loud and playful as the cartoonish images he drew with older sister Yasmine for his CD booklet. "The saturated cover and bold, black outlines are very similar to the way I write and produce music," says Mika, whose frisky falsetto is around every corner. "The colors are very bright and everything is filled in, and the structures are actually very simple."

It's no surprise that Mika's influences include Elton John, Harry Nilsson, Michael Jackson, Prince, Annie Lennox and Queen. He's been compared so often to Freddie Mercury, the late Queen frontman, for his swooping four-octave vocal attack that for the chorus of "Grace Kelly," Mika teasingly sings, "I tried to be Grace Kelly, but all her looks were too sad. So I tried a little Freddie. I've gone identity mad!"

"I'm fascinated by all those artists, including Queen, because of their melodic intensity," says the lanky, leonine singer-pianist. "And it's also pop music that was able to fill stadiums."

Mika certainly has flair and enthusiasm for the big stage, in full display on the new DVD Live in Cartoon Motion, recorded at a 2007 show in Paris, where he spent part of his youth after his family left war-torn Lebanon. Mika and his band appear in perky, perpetual motion for fans with their hands in the air, even donning animal outfits for a "Lollipop" encore as bouncy as the balloons that flood the theater.

"It is a bit like I lead this mad troupe, and I'm very lucky to have managed to get a crew and a band that are willing to play the game," Mika says. "There is an element of visual theater, of doing something a little more than standing against an LED screen and singing our songs. I think it's important, as long as the music is first. You can highlight different emotions or create a world within an auditorium for an hour and 15 minutes to completely separate people from reality. It's quite empowering." ***

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

THE WATERBOY

[JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18]
The full moon in Leo, your cosmic complement, suggests that you'd better pay attention to what's going on with your partnership. Leo is a demanding presence, so despite your involvement with assorted group activities, it's the one-on-one that matters. Now would also be a good time to deal with correspondence, travel plans, orders and repairs that could be affected by Mercury turning retrograde in your sign Jan. 28. The good news: sexy Mars goes direct in your Gemini house of romance and recreation on Jan. 30. Action!

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
Consider adopting the role of the recluse. While the Aquarius sun sets in your "hidden" 12th house and Mercury performs its retrograde routine there, you can avoid being blamed for the petty annoyances that take place when the Messenger merges with your spacey Neptune ruler—twice between today and Groundhog Day and again at the full moon in February. On the other hand, sociable Venus in your career midheaven teaming up with jolly Jupiter sounds like an invitation to join the party and enjoy substantial benefits.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
"Clank." You can almost hear the universe change gears as affable Venus and powerful Pluto shift out of free-wheeling Sagittarius into controlling Capricorn. Let's hope you're already in Mercury retrograde mode because the little imp turns around on the 28th for three weeks. Experience has taught us that the days preceding and following the official stations are often when equipment stops working and wheels stop turning. Of some help: Your crusading Mars ruler goes direct on Jan. 30, just in time for Super Tuesday.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
The start of solar Aquarius, on Jan. 20 this year, is usually a wake-up call to initiate your next career move, the one that'll be a fait accompli by summer. However, Mercury is about to turn retrograde in your Aquarius midheaven, possibly delaying whatever plans you had in mind. You could try to press forward, but don't take it personally if people don't return your calls or e-mails. They might not get the message. Instead, focus on the drama created by your Venus ruler's merger with passionate Pluto on Jan. 23.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Since it's your Mercury ruler that's turning retrograde, fouling up the works for everybody else, be grateful that you'll have two opportunities to come up with excellent excuses. Mercury merges with imaginative Neptune in Aquarius on both Jan. 22 and Groundhog Day. In between there may be intense interest generated by a partnership, both the romantic and the business kind. But because Mercury is in reverse until Feb. 18, you shouldn't commit—e.g., sign a legally binding agreement—for three more weeks. Sorry.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
The MLK Jr. holiday weekend may have turned into a bonanza for both you and an enthusiastic partner. You should thank lucky Jupiter in your Capricorn marriage house for rewarding stable Saturn for its arduous trek through your money house. Although the Leo moon wasn't totally full until early Tuesday morning, you may still be feeling that wonderful sense of satisfaction. If there's a chance to do something special, take it before Mercury flips into reverse Jan. 28 and messes with your access to other people's resources.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
For the next few weeks a great deal of the public's interest will be centered on your Aquarius house of allies and antagonists. Along with your sun ruler's transit, pesky Mercury will be flitting back and forth, making offers and withdrawing them. If you're determined to reach an agreement, make sure you have an expert's eyes reviewing the small print. Otherwise, try to postpone negotiations until February is finally fini. Just in time for serious Super Bowl wagering, lucky Venus joins even luckier Jupiter in your sports zone.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22]
Conveniently for the health-conscious Virgo, the solar energy this month is centered on your Aquarius house of diet, exercise and maintaining your daily routine. Boring for the others? Maybe, but while your Mercury ruler is retracing its path through this zone, it makes perfect (a Virgo adjective) sense to figure out what works for you and what needs improvement. But that's not the whole story: Romantic, artistic and eminently popular Venus may create the ideal Valentine's Day for the August born.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
Enjoying all the attention your Venus ruler is attracting? Good. Worried about too many PDAs aggravating a hothead with a lot of clout? Bad. Perhaps you'll start to cool it a bit after Venus enters conservative Capricorn on Jan. 24. If so, don't neglect to take advantage of the goodies directed your way when Venus meets up with extremely fortunate Jupiter at the mid-winter festival of Imbolc on Feb. 1. You needn't go overboard—no buying a house on impulse—but a few fabulous presents wouldn't hurt.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
How a Scorpio manages to profit financially from what is usually romantic, possibly passionate planetary alignments is your secret to know and ours to admire. Anyway, that's the forecast for your immediate future. Affectionate, lucky Venus in your house of assets, acquisitions and attitudes is completing powerful aspects to both Mars and Pluto, your coruling planets, as well as commanding the attention of conservative, pragmatic Saturn and expansive, optimistic Jupiter. FYI: Clinton's sun is in Scorpio; Obama has Scorpio rising.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Divine intervention or simply a stroke of incredibly good luck? You could be getting far more blessings than the annual marriage of popular Venus and your Jupiter ruler usually bestows. This year their conjunction receives the hard-to-get approval of authoritarian Saturn in Virgo. While the November-born Archer may be struggling with the responsibilities Saturn is foisting on you, the others are rising to the current career challenge and preparing, later rather than right now, for their move into the executive suite.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
The rewarding trine aspect between beneficial Jupiter and your realistic Saturn ruler doesn't occur often enough to take for granted. Since having lucky Jupiter in your sign happens only once every 12 years, try not to bitch too much when Mercury in your Aquarius money house flips into reverse and withholds what you deem is your due. Instead, assume a philosophical, optimistic attitude (one of Jupiter's gifts) and stop fretting. It may be hard to drop the Capricorn negativity, but now is a good time to start.

Curious about the future? *Order a personalized Transit Forecast (30 to 40+ pages) detailing the major themes and issues that will arise over the next 12 months. THE BLACK ROSE [160 State Street, Boston, 617-742-2286. www.irishconnec tion.com] Voted one of America's top ten Irish establishments, The Black Rose is Boston's premier Irish pub and restaurant. Established in 1976, the pub is located in the historic Faneuil Hall-Quincy market area of Boston and is known far and wide for its convivial atmosphere, good food and live Irish entertainment. The menu features honest, made-from-scratch food including traditional Irish fare, award winning clam chowder, fish and chips, native lobster, aged Black Angus cuts of beef and of course, Mother Sweeney's corned beef, a recipe from Mother Sweeney herself. For thirty years, The Black Rose has offered live Irish music seven nights a week. Memorable guests on stage have included members of the Chieftains, flutist James Galway, Tommy Makim, Liam Clancy, John Denver and a once relatively unknown member of an Irish rock group called U2.

The Sunset Grill features 112 beers on tap!

HISTORY BOYS (AND LADIES)

Dan Elias and Karen Keane

David Rousseau and Michael Carter

Good Help Is Hard to Find...

It may be an irony that Historic New England's board chair is from Mississippi or that two of its keenest supporters are both low-country North Carolinians, but there was no shortage of Boston money, both old and new, at the organization's black-tie gala, a dinner and auction held in the ballroom of the Four Seasons.

The evening drew some major names from the world of fine art, including guest auctioneers Leigh and Leslie Keno, distinguished art historian Jay Cantor, MFA jefe Malcolm Rogers and his other half, Andrew Dakin, and Skinner head honcha Karen Keane with her hubby, former Antiques Roadshow host Dan Elias, not to mention such collectors and connoisseurs as Cambridge doyenne Susan Paine, patrician party pair Frank and ML Coolidge, interior designer to the supremely tasteful Michael Carter, beloved townies Paul and Carla McDonough, heiress and righteous reverend Barbara Nielsen, several men who married fortunes, at least two women who divorced them and one guest who said that instead of using the valet, "I took a handicapped space on the street.... After all, I'm an emotional cripple." However, the evening's most amusing exchange took place between a guest at the party and a woman who was just there to meet some friends for a drink at the bar.

"I was in the ladies' room and there was this woman, maybe 90," she said. "The zipper on her dress was down to her ass crack, so I offered to do it up. She said, 'Oh, thank you. My maid wasn't there tonight.'"

Behind Every Great Hockey Player...

The Bruins don't just play hockey, throw haymakers at jerks who deserve them and keep the cosmetic dentistry business booming. They also get writer's cramp from signing autographs, pose endlessly for photos and even suffer indignities like manning a dunking booth, especially when it's for a good cause—and especially when their wives tell them to.

Bruins wives Erin Thornton, Krissy Kobasew, Julie Schaefer, Krista Ference, Natalie Allen and Melissa Thomas

The 18th annual Bruins' Wives' Charity Carnival, held on the floor of the Garden, raised money for Cradles to Crayons and attracted legions of fans who were there to rub elbows with the likes of Patrice Bergeron, Tim Thomas, Dennis Wideman, Milan Lucic, Marc Savard, play-by-play guy Dave Goucher and minor-leaguer Wacey Rabbit (whatever happens to his hockey career, he has one of the best names in the game).

At 6'9", team captain Zdeno Chara may be the tallest man in the NHL, but there was a clown on stilts who made him look puny, while Mark Stuart proved that he's more than a good sport by not beating the crap out of team mascot Blades when he pushed the dunk button after Stuart had already taken the plunge at least a dozen times.

Along with the usual carnival shenanigans like face painting, balloon animals, caricatures and foosball, there was a Shots on Goal booth, Guitar Hero, simulated surfing, ping-pong with the players and locker room tours (where fans got to see the sacred "B" in the middle of the carpet that superstition forbids anyone from treading on).

For the true faithful, however, the highlight had to be a chance to get up close and personal with the Stanley Cup.

"Doesn't that make you wanna cry?" said one, to which his friend replied, "Makes me wanna fill it with champagne and take a sip."

When asked if he was having a good time, another attendee succinctly summed the whole thing up by saying, "The only thing that sucks is you can't drive the Zamboni." ✖✖✖

KELLY
AUTOMOTIVE GROUP

The Kelly Automotive Group Offers Answers to the Frequently Pondered Questions of Car Buyers.

In a world when the internet offers an array of endless automotive data, there are still fundamental questions consumers struggle with every day. So, Brian Kelly, President of the Kelly Automotive Group has produced a series of videos that answer some of these questions, in a detailed, yet easy to understand manner, without a business agenda.

There are four such videos...

- Lease Or Buy
- Best Way To Finance
- How To Read A Car Ad
- How To Choose A Dealer

"I am asked these questions everywhere I go," Brian Kelly explains. "It's time the public has a professional and inside explanation. At first glance, it would be logical to assume these videos are elongated Kelly commercials, but refreshingly they are not."

All four videos are there for your immediate viewing, right now, at kellyauto.com

Dates to Keep

My unattached friends often bemoan the lack of datable singles in Boston. I want to play matchmaker but can never think of anyone worthy. That was before I worked on our Bachelor and Bachelorette issue. We got hundreds of submissions and, despite a few doozies (best not to send photos that look like stills from Girls Gone Wild), plenty stood out.

The Class of 2008 includes a pro hockey player, an architecture whiz and a beloved chef. And that's just the guys. The female roster boasts a ballerina, a yoga guru and a musician. They're at different points in their lives, but all 20 have experienced success.

We could have added cover girl Mindy Kaling to the list. Yet another rising star from NBC's The Office, Mindy cracked us up—always an attractive trait. If any readers out there are mustachioed Bollywood performers, let us know. She's in the market for one.

NICE MASS.

Never judge a book by its cover. Or if you do, remember that the book isn't in it for a sparkly tiara. "I got involved in pageants for the networking opportunities," says Miss Massachusetts USA Jacqueline Bruno, 23. "It's at the top of my résumé." Bruno, a native of Freetown near Fall River, is the very model of a modern beauty queen. She's both practical ("I have a lot of commitments, and that's why I don't have a boyfriend right now") and self-aware ("I'm very type A").

Beauty, of course, is a cruel mistress. Bruno spends an hour and a half at the gym every day training in hopes of winning the sash at the Miss USA pageant in April. "I want to nail the swimsuit," she says. "I'm going out there to focus on being the best Jackie Bruno I can be."

The best Jackie Bruno wasn't good enough for the teenage Casanovas at her high school, where she couldn't even get a date to her prom. "If they wouldn't date me in high school, I won't do it now," laughs Bruno, who looks for a man who's funny and spontaneous, yet ambitious. Her ideal first date takes place at a good Italian restaurant. The second is more intimate. "They've got to come home, and my dad makes a big pot of chicken parmesan. If they can't handle my big, crazy family, they're out!"

Good Eats

FONDUE FOR DEUX Vinyl-cushioned barstools and PBR might not set every romantic's heart aflutter, but this retro-chic diner of a bar has found its softer side in an oversized ramekin of bubbling bittersweet chocolate. Port-spiked bittersweet chocolate, in fact. As if the B-Side Lounge would be so mainstream as to make a cloying confection, chef Tomas Garcia's boozy rendition of this typically ho-hum treat takes on a faint tannic burn. An order brings fondue staples, including strawberries and bananas, plus sugar-dredged dried fruits. The dish is a mix of comfort and surprise, like all good relationships. ELIZABETH BOMZE

¼ oz. smoked Coca-Cola syrup

Garnish with chocolate-dipped maraschino cherries

Drink of the Moment

Up in Smoke

"Some people are going to hate it," confesses bartender Justin Baker of Boston Public's new Strangelove cocktail. "It's very different. It takes a special person."

A true drinker loves a challenge.

The distinctive martini was created by cocktail connoisseur Alexei Beratis. Not one to shy away from unusual ingredients, Beratis' concoctions feature homemade lemongrass soda and candy sprinkles. "They just come to me in the middle of the night, and I run down to chef and ask, 'Can we do this?'" he says.

What puts the strange in the Strangelove is Coca-Cola syrup that's home-smoked with hay. The result is a drink that, despite its name, look and garnish, isn't overly romantic.

Assistant manager Scott Farrell adds, "It's the only martini that would complement a steak. It's comparable to a strong red."

Swigs of Strangelove lie thick on the tongue, then rise to the roof with smoke and heat. The taste is sweet and dirty—not unclean, but wicked—a gustatory fast-forward to 2 am when the notion of a hangover doesn't sound so painful. It's precaution or preview in a glass.

Question for Slaine

What are your five favorite hip-hop songs inspired by love?

1. "TEENAGE LOVE"—Slick Rick
Who didn't fall in love when they were 16? Slick Rick is the best storyteller of all time, and bitches love gold chains and eye patches. Everybody knows that.

2. "PUT IT IN YOUR MOUTH"—Akinyele
CVS should have a section of Hallmark cards with the same title.

3. "POISON"—BBD
That fed-up girl you thought you were in love with? She is evil and crazy. Run. Really—hurry up.

4. "KIM"—Eminem
Maybe you didn't kill her, but if you did, this is what it would have sounded like.

5. "SHE SWALLOWED IT"—NWA
In the forgiveness process, this goes a long way.

Busted

Girl-next-door meets Fembot with the bustier dress, a look that rocked ready-to-wear collections from Bottega Veneta to Vivienne Westwood. While the style is inherently sexy, designers interpreted it differently by varying the stitching and materials. Paired with the season's flat sandals or strappy heels, it works for day and night. For once, a trend that appeals to both sexes.

Going Out

ARTISAN AND CRAFT

In the open kitchen, Andrea Benatti shakes a blazing sauté pan. With the flame flashing against his bright orange chef's jacket, the scruffy, bespectacled Benatti looks like a hip wolfman at work. Describing his namesake restaurant, he stumbles over his enthusiasm, leaving accented puzzle pieces for longtime business partner Ana Encanacao to put together. "After seven or eight years in Key West, I was getting tired," he says. "It was time to grow up, to live more."

"And work more," adds Encanacao.

After making a killing in the seasonal market with the nationally recognized Opera, Benatti opened his Inman Square eatery Jan. 8. Trading months off every year for a six-day workweek has slashed his downtime, but it affords him the chance to better showcase northern Italian cuisine.

Born in the Emilia Romagna region in his grandmother's restaurant, Benatti reveres the products he creates and serves. "There is no can; everything is made from scratch," he assures, before listing his imported ingredients: Parmigiano-Reggiano, prosciutto di parma, aged modena balsamic vinegar. "Truffles from Alba," Encanacao adds.

Casually maligning the approach of other fine Italian eateries, Benatti has a likable cockiness. Tradition and individuality meet in appetizers like smoky pan-seared sea scallops over sautéed fennel and spinach with an orange juice reduction ($15). Handmade pastas and fillings include classic tortellini with pork, veal and prosciutto in a Parmigiano-Reggiano sauce ($22). Even the desserts show inventiveness, like pear poached in Nocino with Gorgonzola gelato ($14).

Benatti cares more about quality than volume, limiting his place to 25 seats. "We prefer to [let people stay] a couple hours than rush and have them have a bad experience," he explains. For now, Benatti is relatively unknown. Go before he has a full house.

POTTY HUMOR The Cellar's graffiti

Writing on the Wall

Local lore has it that Boston and Cambridge have nothing in common except for the weather. Cambridge is supposed to be a cloistered republic of hairy socialists with a weakness for experimental theater. Bostonians are supposed to be hard-boiled bourgeois who can barely stop thinking about real estate values long enough to scream, "Go Sox!" But the truth is more muddled. For a glimpse into the souls of our fellow citizens, you have to catch them at private moments, when they're most exposed. So we compared the graffiti in the restrooms at two bars on opposite sides of the Charles. Try to guess which lines were penned by the outhouse bards at the Cellar in Cambridge, and which ones sprung from the fervid talents relieving themselves at Boston's Other Side Café:

"Cheese is delicious."

"Drunk is the new horny."

"The ultimate gift of life is to be cognizant of your failings—but to thrive, despite all evidence to the contrary."

"We don't talk to ~~POLICE~~ the voices in my head."

"I love Olek's nuts."

"What really matters most in the whole world is drunken anarchic love."

Only the first three are from the Cellar, but a similar spirit informs all of them: beer humor, sexual angst and a whiff of pretension. It seems that Bostonians and Cantabrigians share something very deep, indeed. It's called alcohol.

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

rfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION
The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE
The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY
The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD
The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL
The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING
While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT
The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING
The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL
A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

WHACK DADDY

TO THE PARENT I SPOKE to in the Boston Children's Museum:
Thank you for livening up an otherwise slow Tuesday afternoon. You don't recall the incident I'm referring to? Let me refresh your memory. Last week, I was passing through the Johnny's Workshop exhibition when your little Bob the Builder decided to play Whack-A-Mole with an unsuspecting playmate. As a little girl shyly tinkered with a telephone, your aspiring Bob Vila grabbed a screwdriver by the tip and bonked the little tot squarely on the noggin. When I confronted you about your child's behavior, you reminded your little angel to "play nice" and insisted that you didn't want to stifle his creativity. My mistake; he was clearly exercising that creativity by sculpting an artistic goose egg on the girl's forehead. Silly me for trying to crush a child's imagination in favor of decorum.

Dear city-dwelling dog owners,

What the hell is wrong with you? Seriously, what's your problem? Stop complaining about how you always have to go walk him, or how you can't take a vacation because you don't have a pet-sitter. Boo-freaking-hoo. What? Did you forget it was your idea to get the dog in the first place? I mean, it's not like it just showed up on your doorstep in a basket. You picked it out. And then you have the audacity to bitch about it? Puh-lease. You know who should really be complaining? Your dog. Do you know what a dog's favorite thing to do is? It's called running around and digging stuff up. You think he gets to do that in your 500-square-foot apartment? Not a chance. You probably leave him in a cage all day, don't you? Man, you're sick. Do you know how stressed out your dog is right now? He's grinding his teeth as we speak. And he doesn't pee on the floor because he doesn't know any better; he does it because he's really mad at you. Then when you finally take him out for a walk, you throw a sweater, hat and some booties on him and he feels like an idiot. He's not a freaking Barbie doll. If you really want a dog, move to the suburbs and give that poor thing a yard so he can stop doing his business all over the sidewalks. Everyone will be much better off.

Q: WHAT DOES THE FUTURE HOLD FOR TOM BRADY'S LOVE LIFE?

He is very much in love with this gorgeous woman, but is also searching for some kind of happiness in himself. He never had time to heal from his last relationship, and there are still many things that he'll have to deal with on his own. He is a very loving person, but there is some kind of bitterness from the past that is interfering with their future. Gisele is a very powerful woman, which is difficult because he does not like to be controlled. He is meant to be a leader, never a follower. This is what will ultimately make it so improbable that the relationship lasts.

IF YOU WERE KING OR QUEEN of somewhere, your illuminated manuscripts couldn't be more rich, delicate and luscious than Maria Thomas' invitations for Newport-based Pendragon. Her calligraphy blends gravitas and insouciance, with letters trailing lines like a dancer flicking a flirtatious veil, and drawings that incorporate nature's sensuality (roses, cozy mice, sexy pears, pomegranates, garlic). On substantial handmade paper using walnut ink, an invitation, proclamation, arresting quote or poem may have an ornamented oval peekaboo shape and open like an armoire, revealing interesting angles and cutouts. Or it may unfold to share a fairy tale about the couple or forecast, "Dinner and dancing under the glittering trees in the courtyard." Adding place cards and menus keeps the event swooping in one stylistic direction. Thomas also lends this beauty and comfort to bereavement cards, with a drawing and words highlighting the charms of the person being commemorated. Consider Pendragon music in writing.

Period of Maladjustment

MICHAEL BURNS' BOOK The Kings of Innocence follows suburban 20-somethings through rollicking and rocky times. At home in Belmont for a few weeks to teen-sit his brother, Roy McGrath finds himself swirling back into the landscape he inhabited as a child. It's a tightly meshed guy's world—spiced up by sexy, daring girlfriends—where old loyalties and connections transcend differences developed over the years. Jay Cantwell, though a third-grade teacher, is slacking dangerously, getting into gambling and debt. Pal Mark Luna has become an ambitious police officer, walking a teetery balance between being the voice of the law and abetting his old friends by covering up their illegal activities, drug dealing and skirting the edges of the mafia. These kids are half privileged products of tame and cozy Belmont, half lost souls. As they merrily watch sports in bars, keeping an eye on cheating girlfriends while stoically clutching broken hearts, their devotion remains the common theme. Burns' irreverent voice wonderfully captures the raffish energy of their friendships and the flavor of their young, reckless, nervous lives.

Painless Pairing Wish you had a sommelier at your beck and call? Ralph Hersom—of Manhattan's famed Le Cirque—is your man. While the South Grafton native doesn't make house calls, he is overseeing a new line of vino that takes the guesswork out of pairing dinner and drink. The name, Wine That Loves, seems as simple and smart as the concept.

The four reds and one white—from Amazing Wine Food Company—go with five American staples. There's a bold, grapey flavor for roast chicken; drier, plum-like notes for grilled steak; bright sweetness for pasta with tomato sauce; brisk peach and pineapple for grilled salmon; and bracing spice for pizza.

The wines may not score top marks from Robert Parker anytime soon, but they win points for ingenuity. And for making life easier.

REAL ESTATE LIVING SINGLE

There's many a place to find singles in Boston: an eight-minute dating event, last call at Daisy's, strewn across the stage at Centerfolds. But if you want to live near the unattached, we've got one word for you:

Southie. "If you'd asked me last year, I would have said East Boston, but right now a bulk of the singles are moving to South Boston," Ken Tutunjian, senior VP at Coldwell Banker, tells us. "There are a bunch of properties, like the Macallen Building, that are brand new and more affordable than [other parts of] Boston. The single demographic is very mobile, and that's where they're making their move."

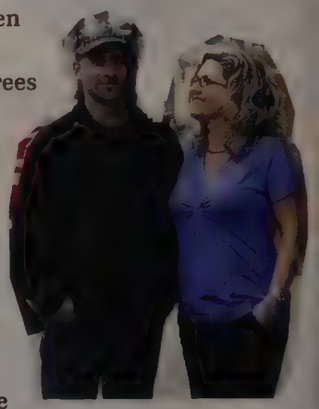
VITTLES & VERVE

Vee Vee comes to Jamaica Plain.

UPBEAT AND CONFIDENT, the co-owner of almost-open Vee Vee Bistro in Jamaica Plain makes it clear that the restaurant's name isn't a cute ploy to lure vegetarians.

"It's kind of self-explanatory, isn't it!" laughs Kristen Valachovic, who along with her husband, Dan, believes their tiny, 20-seat eatery will gain a foothold in these iffy economic times by offering a reasonably priced menu that will "focus on seafood, vegetables and grains," she says. "Meat will be an accent."



Owners Dan and Kristen Valachovic

With a half-dozen each of appetizers ($6–$10) and entrees ($14–$20), chef Brendan Wood, formerly of Eastern Standard and Lucca, is creating a menu featuring dishes such as wild mushroom pâté with sherry-thyme glace, herb-basted cod with wheatberries, and cornmeal-crusted skatewing with sunchoke puree and salsa verde.

"It won't be a plate of food as big as your head, with leftovers for three days," says Kristen, who's waited tables at Zon's and Sorellina. "We've all seen that. It will be warm and comfortable, the kind of restaurant we like to go to."

Dan, most recently the bar manager at Zon's, has put together a selection of beers from craft breweries and lesser-known varietal wines from small producers.

Eventually, says Kristen, they'd like to expand the space and open for lunch and brunch. Nothing fancy, nothing gastronomically groundbreaking. The priority, she says, is "to make everyone feel at home and well taken care of."

VEG OUT Vee Vee serves greens, grains and fish.

COME SAIL AWAY

La Voile blows onto the French dining scene.

IF NOTHING ELSE, Boston is contrarian. While much of the nation—including our own former governor—routinely trashes all things French, local diners have an extended love affair with la cuisine française. Old stalwarts like L'Espalier and Aujourd'hui were joined a half dozen years ago by Seth Woods' midscale offerings, Aquitaine and Aquitaine Bis. Jacky Robert's twin Petit Robert Bistros light up Kenmore Square and the South End, while Miel and Sel de la Terre distinguish the waterfront. And last year Gaslight, an authentic Gallic outpost in trendy SoWa, joined the fray. Now a brash young team from Cannes has blown into town with their aptly named La Voile (the sail).

TASTE THE TERROIR The restaurant's value-priced wine

Nautical motifs dominate this Newbury Street townhouse. With copious sailboat prints, models and stencils, the seaside ambience is inescapable. Appropriately, the food is fresh and vibrant, like a sunny day riding the waves. Take the soupe de poissons ($14). A regional specialty of the Côte d'Azur, it's a concentrated fish soup simmered with onions, tomato, celery, a touch of fennel, garlic and olive oil, and seasoned with sage, bay leaf and saffron. With a traditional garnish of croutons, aioli and shredded Gruyère, it made a perfect supper, augmented by crusty French baguettes and sweet butter.

A satiny "escalop" of duck liver foie gras ($20) was reminiscent of a specialty made by my favorite Polish aunt. An assortment of French charcuterie ($16) included silky Bayonne ham, rabbit terrine and hunks of a coarse pâté de campagne, whose richness didn't emerge until warmed from its refrigerated temperature.

The light and refreshing endive salad ($11) featured whole leaves radiating from a hub of chopped endive, which contrasted wonderfully with the walnuts, apples, Roquefort cheese and cherry tomatoes. Both mussels "mariniere" ($16), simmered in a broth of white wine, onions and herbs, and mussels "sauce Paulette" ($18), in a light cream sauce, came in gargantuan portions accompanied by fresh, crisp fries.

Of the main courses, the thick filet of roast halibut ($25) won first prize, its snowy white flesh at once firm, flaky and moist. An extravagant garnish of fresh vegetables—green beans, snow peas, baby Brussels sprouts, thin slices of zucchini and carrots, and potatoes infused with olive oil and basil—brought back memories of my very first meal in France, in which I discovered that vegetables don't have to be overcooked, perfunctory tagalongs. A recent menu addition, choucroute garni ($29), baked sauerkraut with three kinds of sausages and a slab of smoked pork, proved a worthy exemplar of this Alsatian soul food. Roast chicken "L'Ami Louis" ($18), named after a celebrated Parisian restaurant, boasted crispy, well-herbed skin and tender, succulent flesh. The supersized portion rivaled that of the mussels. A rack of lamb ($29), in contrast, brought four skimpy chops. However, the lamb's accompanying vegetables—robust ratatouille, stuffed tomato and cheesy Dauphine potatoes—far outshone the un-French mashed potatoes which came with the chicken.

Chocolate cake and pistachio ice cream

Portions at La Voile were so large that dessert became more than optional. You can skip the undistinguished, off-texture and bland chocolate mousse ($7.50). However, the intense liquid center of the warm chocolate cake ($7.50) and the superb pistachio ice cream accompaniment made that choice worth the calories.

Also worth the calories: La Voile's wine. The restaurant's list included some value-priced selections, especially the St. Maurice Côte du Rhône ($27) and Rosé de Provence ($30), that evoked the marvelous terroir of the region.

To paraphrase a friend, you can't eat ambience. With food as good as La Voile's, there's no need, but the authentic French atmosphere made first-rate meals even better. ✖✖✖

The 2008 Boston Wine Festival opened Jan. 11 with a reception and tasting at the Boston Harbor Hotel's Wharf Room. Some 500 people enjoyed offerings from more than 50 wineries and a buffet prepared by hotel chef Daniel Bruce.

The Go Red event took place Jan. 23 at Sara Campbell in the South End. Some 150 guests attended the gathering, which raised awareness for the Go Red for Women movement and kicked off the store's fundraiser for the American Heart Association. Ten percent of their February sales will go to the AHA.

OUT OF LINE

New life experiment: deciding not to wait

I'M FAR TOO IMPORTANT to wait in lines. And so are you. You may think lines are unavoidable, but the fact is that most of the time, you choose to wait in them. And if you do that, you're a sucker. Decide to free yourself of lines, and you'll see them for what they are: a voluntary congregation of feeble-minded chumps who are too dim and passive to throw off the shackles of arbitrary queues. To paraphrase En Vogue, free your mind, and the rest will follow. Don't stand in line, unless you're a loser.

I got to thinking about this while sitting at a table at a local establishment, happily sipping a beer and gazing out the window at the line of people waiting to get into another bar. I can understand standing in line if it's 1987 and you live in East Germany and it's the monthly Toilet Paper Distribution Day, but standing in line for drinks and music in downtown Boston is like waiting in line for cheese in Wisconsin or transvestite hookers on my old street in Bay Village. There are other options.

As someone who doesn't wait in lines, if I were planning to go to a bar but encountered 300 people between me and the door, I might decide instead to hit one of the roughly 100 other options in a given neighborhood. And because I don't wait in lines, I've discovered that some places have invested in their own infrastructure upgrades, perhaps as incentive to lure a few people away from the juggernauts. For example, did you know that the basement at Sanctuary has stripper poles? It's true.

Amusement parks are another notorious source of endless lines. But, as I discovered last summer at Six Flags, modern technology has given us a workaround. For an extra 50 bucks or so, they'll give you a little electronic scanner that lets you walk right past the schmucks, straight to the front. If $50 sounds expensive, think of it this way: You're paying about 2.5 times the money to go on 20 times the rides—and that might be a conservative estimate. Plus, you get to barge past all the people waiting in line, a move that caused one of my friends to observe, "I don't know what's more fun—the rides, or cutting everyone in line on our way to the rides."

Fine, you say, avoiding lines at a bar or amusement park is one thing, but how does one beat the seemingly unavoidable choke points at airport security? I've got a strategy for that one, too. It's a quirk of airport etiquette that you don't have to stand in line at security, as long as you're selfish and immature enough to be on the verge of missing your flight. That's just the way it works—if you plan meticulously, set your alarm for 5 am and skip breakfast in order to ensure a timely arrival, then you've got to wait in line. But the guy who rolls in 45 minutes before departure, stops at the lounge for a Bloody Mary and then decides it might be time to head for security gets treated like a celebrity. Sir! Your flight leaves in just a few minutes! You'd better rush right past all these more responsible people and get to your gate.

Reject the status queue!

You may think lines are unavoidable, but the fact is you choose to wait in them.

So, the last time I was at Logan, that's what I did. It worked perfectly. While all the bleary-eyed morning travelers stood in line, I marched directly to the crew entrance, boarding pass in hand, and politely explained that I was about to miss my flight. Thirty seconds later, I was striding to my gate, while all the people who'd been responsible enough to get to the airport on time stood there glaring at me, the same way I do when I witness someone else successfully employ the Late Gambit. Did I feel like a jerk? Yes. Was it worth it? Obviously.

There are other basic strategies to minimize your line time. For instance, always avoid human interaction when possible, because humans are slow and inefficient and machines are awesome. I'm all about automated flight check-in, online RMV transactions and self-checkout at Home Depot (though it's sometimes hard to get larger items, such as lawn tractors, up onto the little barcode-scanner window). If I could've applied for a home mortgage through an ATM, I would've done it.

Humans are slow and inefficient and machines are awesome.

One downside to the spread of automation is that you forget how to deal with actual people, in the rare cases when that's still necessary; the last time I had to use a bank teller, I jammed my ATM card in her mouth and poked her in the eyes trying to enter my PIN.

Another problem with leading a lineless life is that your patience declines severely. Last weekend, there was one guy in front of me at Blockbuster and I almost pegged him with a box of Good & Plenty candy when he took longer than 30 seconds to pay for his movie. And a two-person line at Stop & Shop got me so flustered that I dropped my Cholula as I was taking it out of the cart, and it smashed all over the floor. This prompted a call over the intercom for cleanup at register six, which actually made me happy, because I'd triggered a cliche supermarket intercom phrase. I should've brought some anti-itch rectal cream with the bar code scratched off so that could get a price check, too.

My new policy isn't perfect. The other day I walked into two different Starbucks and walked right back out when I found huge lines inside. So I didn't wait in line, but I didn't get my coffee, either. It was a classic Catch-22: I didn't want to wait in line at Starbucks, but if I'd had some coffee in my system, I probably would've at least thought to ask someone for frontsies-backsies. ✖✖✖

BOSTON'S NEWCOMERS

Local immigrants find surprises in the home of the brave.

Servings of the American dream all around

I RECENTLY HEARD A STATISTIC that supposedly came out of the mayor's office. It said that of Boston's current population, 50 percent of the residents didn't live here 10 years ago. I walked the length of Newbury Street this weekend and stopped people whenever I heard a foreign language. You learn things when you're nosy. I passed shoppers from Kosovo, Cambodia, Haiti, Brazil, Israel, New Zealand and Ukraine. I believe the mayor's statistic, and it still amazes me.

My grandfather came to Boston from Eastern Europe and settled in the old West End, long before Charles River Park took the tenements and the character away. Six people lived in a three-room apartment, and the family stored the coal for heating in the one bathtub. My grandfather's goal was to become American as quickly as possible, picking up the language and throwing himself into sports at an early age: baseball, running, swimming in the Charles River, sneaking into burlesque shows in Scollay Square. Now his grandchildren have joined our fragmented society, living around the world. Many share the most common of new American institutions: divorce.

Underscoring this theme, I had a ride with a cabdriver recently. He was from Beirut, Lebanon, and trained as a lawyer. He arrived here after the latest Hezbollah violence. "What about America has most surprised you?" I asked him.

"In Beirut," he said, "my whole family—uncles, cousins, grandparents—lived in the same block, some of the generations in the same apartment house. We are together constantly, supporting and helping each other. I am surprised by how little a close family means in America. You people are all over the place."

I also talked at length to a young man whose enthusiasm echoed the immigrant tales my grandfather shared. Yacine came here from Algeria, knowing only a cousin. There are strong Algerian enclaves in Winthrop, East Boston and Revere, where the family unit is valued above all else. "I speak French almost as my first language," Yacine told me. "Then, with family and friends, a kind of 'street' Arabic, slang almost, with French, Portuguese thrown in. With my employer, even with Algerian coworkers around, we speak English. In respect to our new country and respect to our boss." Respect and dignity are Yacine's hallmarks. And a sweet, sly smile that seems to say, "I have seen a lot, and I still believe in the goodness of people."

"Never give up teaching what you believe."

Yacine worked as a journalist in Algiers but was schooled as an environmental expert in reclaiming land from disasters like fires and floods. "One night," he said, "a folded white cloth was placed on our family's doorstep, meant for me. It was from terrorists, symbolizing a shroud. I had been writing about democracy, and the shroud signaled that I, and all my family, was in jeopardy. This was in 1989. My wife and I fled the country, a society that had become full of fear and distrust."

"What are the most dramatic impressions and thoughts you have about the United States?" I asked. He offered the following:

1. "Freedom is the biggest surprise. Freedom to fail or freedom to be a giant success."

2. "If I had gone to Europe instead of here, what a difference. In Europe, most people shun us. Here we are greeted with encouragement. If you seem serious, you will be helped."

3. "I can work 'til midnight or later here, walk home, no worry."

4. "At home they pick up trash every day in the streets and it still is always filthy. Here it's once a week and amazingly clean."

I asked Yacine how difficult it was to raise three kids in our overly permissive society.

"Very tough," he said. "But the answer is to repeat your lessons in life to them. Never give up teaching what you believe."

"Do you believe in miracles?" I asked. He flashed his charming grin.

"I believe in hard work," he said. "Often, I listen to jazz, and I think of what my mother always said to me: 'Lead your life as if you will live forever. Practice your faith as if you will die tomorrow.'"

Not bad advice, whether you search for the American dream or any dream at all. ***

ON SUPER BOWLS, SUPER COMMERCIALS, JOHAN SANTANA & LEON POWE

3 Celtics Thoughts

My Left Hook... How predictable has Kendrick Perkins' right-handed hook shot become? In a game last week, Mark Blount was defending Perk so hard to his right that at one point there was literally no one standing between Perk and the basket. The big man never even considered making a move to the left. Got to do it like Beyoncé, Perk.

▸Powe!... There's making the most of your minutes, and then there's Leon Powe. Have you ever seen a role player perform at such a constant level of crazed enthusiasm? His hyperactive play reminds us of Tommy Davidson's character in Ace Ventura 2 (early candidate for obscure reference of the year). Maybe one night Doc should bring Leon to the game in a backpack, untie him right before tip-off and let him run wild.

Simple Sam... We were cool with the C's passing on Damon Stoudamire, but if Sam Cassell gets bought out by the Clippers, they need to bring him on board.

5 SUPER PREDICTIONS

Here's the deal: We had a pre-Super Bowl deadline, but refused to forego coverage. So the following five predictions were written before the game, and now sit before your judgmental post-Super Bowl eyes. How confident are we in our picks? If more than two are wrong, we'll streak the BPL wearing only a Giants helmet.

Rodney Harrison will have an INT
Maybe it feels like Rodney Harrison only intercepts passes in huge playoff games... or maybe he just does. In 56 regular games since joining the Pats in 2003, Harrison's intercepted seven passes. Coincidentally, or not, that's the same number of picks he's got in a mere eight playoff contests. He'll have another in XLII.

Wes Welker will lead the game in receptions
The Giants cornerbacks aren't just beat up, they're disintegrating before our very eyes. And even though Randy Moss has struggled in the playoffs, it's going to take all of New York's depleting strength to stop him. That leaves Welker to own the middle. He'll have at least eight catches.

Umenyiora's not touching Brady until their post-game handshake.

Joe Buck will be offended
Perhaps Laurence Maroney will talk too much trash, or Vince Wilfork will hit Eli Manning after the whistle, or Welker's facial hair will look too unkempt. Whatever it is, something will so flagrantly offend FOX announcer Joe Buck that he'll have no choice but to spend five minutes explaining how offended he is. Bonus: It will be infuriating to listen to.

Umenyiora will go sackless
No, we aren't suggesting Giants DE Osi Umenyiora will castrate himself before the game, but he might feel as though he did after Matt Light's done with him. Umenyiora's not touching Brady until their post-game handshake.

Pats win another
This is the big one. Everyone's trying to talk themselves into this being a close game, but we don't see it. It's been nearly three months since the Pats played a game in decent weather, but Glendale will present the perfect climate for an offensive onslaught. And Eli Manning is still Eli Manning, especially in the Super Bowl. Pats win big, 42-21. And Brady wins his third MVP.

4 DATES TO WATCH

2/10 It's the 2008 Pro Bowl in Hawaii. What a shame that LaDainian Tomlinson is missing this one with a knee injury. It's the kind of game where you know he'd prove to everyone once and for all what a tough, gritty competitor he is. The dude was born for Pro Bowl heroics.

2/14 Red Sox pitchers and catchers report to spring training in Fort Myers or—as it'll be known after a Valentine's Day gift from a certain Boston hurler—Fort Shonda Schilling.

2/17 The NBA All-Star Game tips off in New Orleans with your Eastern Conference coach, Doc Rivers. Last year, that phrase would have sounded about as uneven as "PETA president Michael Vick," but Doc deserves it. The Celtics might have 40 wins before the break. How can you argue with that?

2/19 The C's kick off their toughest road trip of the season. It's tonight in Denver followed by four games in six days against Phoenix, Golden State, Portland and the Clippers. They need at least three wins here. Need them for what? We don't know. They just need them.

2 SUPER BOWL ADS YOU DIDN'T SEE

Randy Moss for James Sokolove: "Next time one of your ladies tries to blackmail you on domestic violence charges the week before the AFC Championship, turn to one man: James Sokolove. I did, and look at me now. I'm a Super Bowl champion!"

Kill Me Gently, Kill Me Slowly: So this guy's driving around in his Jeep, minding his own business, when a squirrel and two birds hop in the sunroof. So funny, right? Now everyone in the car starts—you ready for this?—singing together! Like, even the animals. But uh oh, here comes a wolf, which usually means trouble... and this time is no exception. The wolf mauls the guy, who then careens the Jeep over a cliff. And... scene.

BIT OF PERSPECTIVE

The next time you're about to complain about something around here, consider the plight of Miami Heat fans at a Jan. 29 game against the Celtics. First off, the Heat are awful, so you know everyone there really only went to get a firsthand look at the PGA Tour. One problem: KG and Ray Allen were both scratches. But hey, now maybe the Heat might play a competitive game, right? Wrong. The short-handed C's handed Miami its most embarrassing loss of the season (117-87), and this year, that's saying a lot.

Bonus Track: Meet the Met

So Johan Santana's not coming to Boston after all. And while we're a little disappointed, we're by no means surprised. It never felt like the Sox had their heart in this trade. And in the end, you can't blame them. Imagine you collect yachts; in fact, you have the most impressive collection in the world. One day you're at an auction, and this magnificent multimillion-dollar bastard comes up for bid. You think, "Wow, that's beautiful, but also pretty expensive, even for me. I think I'll pass; I'm fine with what I have." But then, across the room, you see your next door neighbor. You hate this guy. He makes nasty comments to your wife, lets his dog crap on your lawn and you're pretty sure he steals your Wi-Fi. He's also your biggest rival in the yachting game. If he gets his hands on this thing, you'll never hear the end of it, and, most important, it might give him a better collection. Suddenly, you're interested. In this case, the Sox kept raising the price (they ultimately had more to offer) until the Yankees were scared off, and then stepped aside so the Mets (that weird neighbor who you only ever see at the town fireworks on the Fourth of July) could swoop in and take Santana far, far away. The Sox would have willingly parted with prospects to block Santana from the Yankees, but they certainly have no regrets about him being with the Mets. And neither do we.

Soroff On MINDY KALING

The Office's chatterbox chats about sororities and Bollywood dreams.

MINDY KALING IS A WRITER, PRODUCER AND ACTOR on NBC's The Office, playing perky Kelly Kapoor. Born Vera Chokalingam, Kaling, 28, grew up in Cambridge and attended Buckingham, Browne & Nichols before going to Dartmouth. She cowrote and costarred in the off-Broadway hit Matt & Ben (in which she played Ben Affleck), which was on Rolling Stone's Hot List and one of Time Magazine's Top 10 theatrical events of 2003. Her film credits include The 40-Year-Old Virgin, License to Wed and Unaccompanied Minors. She was also a guest writer on Saturday Night Live and appeared on Curb Your Enthusiasm. She lives in L.A. and is currently writing a sorority comedy for Fox Atomic.

Jonathan Soroff: Are you as bubbly in real life as your character on the show?
Mindy Kaling: No, I'm not bubbly. But my voice is the same as the character, so people expect the same kind of fool that Kelly is. I don't have that ability to chatter on about Paris Hilton.

So would you describe yourself as perky?
Perky has a sort of sorority-girl connotation. I'm not sure I've ever met someone who was perky who was also really smart, so I'd say no.

Speaking of sororities, you're working on a sorority comedy. Which one were you in?
I was in it for half a semester at Dartmouth, and I didn't like it. I was in Sigma Delt.

What are they like?
Their reputation is hard-drinking rugby girls, and I was one of the only people at Dartmouth who didn't drink and hadn't played sports since eighth grade. But I was seduced by the fact that they were superfriendly to me. At Dartmouth, either you were a buttoned-up sort of blonde girl or a wild rugger. But I didn't like cleaning up after parties I didn't attend, so I quit.

Were there any secret lesbian initiation rituals?
God, no. That would've been soooo juicy. I think the most salacious thing we did was strip down to our underwear and T-shirts and put blindfolds on, then put our hands in garbage bags full of things like Gummy Worms. And they were like, "You're touching brains." It was a cross between an initiation ceremony and a haunted house for very small children. Distinctly unexciting.

When you watch yourself as Kelly, don't you just want to slap her?
Yeah, she talks on and on about nothing, and I can't imagine how insufferable that person would be to work with.

Biggest difference between Cambridge and Hollywood?
The PhDs per square foot I think.

You mean it's higher in L.A.
[Laughs.] No. One thing I find very similar between Cambridge and L.A. is the strange devotion to Whole Foods. It's the annoying person's social equalizer. In both places, the lamest people are into shopping at Whole Foods, which made me feel at home when I got here.

Which do you prefer: writing, producing or acting?
Writing, because it's almost a prerequisite that you're a chubby, cantankerous person who wears gym shorts and torn T-shirts. You're celebrated if you don't look that great. Whereas as an actress, I have to go to the gym and wear makeup and I can't swear.

Worst office job you ever had?
For three months, I was a production assistant on a show called Crossing Over With John Edward [where a psychic contacts dead loved ones]. That was pretty painful. All day, you talk to grieving people and do stuff like ask them for photos of their late husband.

Worst job overall?
I worked in a video store in high school, and that sounded like it might be fun, that you'd be watching movies all day. But there are all these secret rules, like you can only watch PG movies in the store, which I found out the hard way.

True or false: Arnold Schwarzenegger has bad breath?
False. I haven't met him, but I've seen Maria Shriver around, and I've never seen a woman more put together. She's slightly skeletal…

Her jaw is threatening to take over the planet…
I know. She's just this beautiful walking skeleton, and their children are insanely well-behaved, so I just imagine she'd be like, "Honey, you've got to brush your teeth."

Lamest thing you ever did when you had a crush on someone?
Calling just to hear them say, "Hello," and then hanging up. I know it's pretty common, but the fact that I did that into my mid-20s is probably what sets me apart. Seems like something you'd do when you're 12, and the fact that I did it when I was 23 sort of singles me out a bit.

Best part of being an Indian actress?
I just got nominated for an NAACP award, and I was like, "Really!? That's so interesting, because I'm not black. I'm Indian." So that's one advantage—getting mistaken for African American.

Your real name is Vera. How'd you get from that to Mindy?
No one's ever called me Vera. I've been Mindy since I was born. When my Mom was pregnant, my parents were living in Nigeria and wanted a cute American name, because they were moving here, and they knew Mindy from Mork & Mindy. Vera isn't just an old Russian lady's name, it's an incarnation of a Hindu goddess. But they never called me it.

Your real last name is Chokalingam. Ever use it in a credit?
If they ever hire me to be the singing heroine of a Bollywood movie, sure.

I'd fly out to see you in a Bollywood spectacular.
I'd be thrilled for the outfits alone, but I've also always wanted a mustachioed love interest. I think the only way to do that is in Bollywood.

Would you rather be part of an ensemble or the star of the show?
Oh, God, star of the show! I'm no shrinking violet. I'd love my own I Dream of Jeannie–type show, where I lived inside a bottle or something. But it's really hard to do that. Very few people can carry a show.

Last question: What's your IQ?
Whatever the highest is—it's that plus five. I don't remember the exact number, but I do remember them saying, "It's amazing. This is not just the highest ever, it's five more." Then they said, "It's not really financially viable for us to change things just for one supergenius, so we'll just let you and MENSA work it out." ✖✖✖

Boston's Most Eligible Bachelors and Bachelorettes

Single-Minded

By Jonathan Soroff

Photographs by Tracy Powell

For the romantically unattached, the weeks leading up to Feb. 14 can seem custom-designed to make you feel like a leprous, undesirable loser, what with all the cupids and bouquets of roses and heart-shaped boxes of chocolates that accompany that most Hallmark of holidays, Valentine's Day.

Well, to use a bad pun, take heart.

For one thing, the historical St. Valentine was clubbed to death and had his head chopped off, which isn't exactly romantic (unless you're into that sort of thing). For another, you're not alone. It's cool to be single, no matter what the florists and greeting card companies say, and we have the proof.

On the pages that follow, you'll find 20 shining examples of people who are attractive and accomplished and lead full and interesting lives: 10 men and 10 women (including one gay man and one lesbian, as per the general population) who are currently unspoken for. (Which, incidentally, doesn't mean they want to hear from you.)

Footloose and fancy-free never looked so good. Our roster of all-stars includes artsy types and brainiacs, financial whizzes and social activists—in short, a cross-section of the many different interests and industries in which Boston is a leader. The one thing they all have in common, though, is that we'd be proud to fix up our little sister, big brother or best friend with them.

So enjoy Boston's Most Eligible Bachelors and Bachelorettes, Class of 2008. And enjoy being single.

Danny Forster, 30, Architect

As host of the Discovery Channel's Build It Bigger and the forthcoming Science Channel series Build It Greener, he travels the globe exploring some of the world's largest and most complex engineering and architectural marvels. He's also the founder and principal of dkf Architecture, a firm which designs and builds sustainable architecture, and has projects underway in Michigan, New Jersey and New York. Born in Brooklyn, he was raised in Tenafly, N.J., and was president of his high school debate team before attending Wesleyan. From there, it was on to Harvard's Graduate School of Design, where he earned several awards and accolades. Although a former high school wrestler, he doesn't have much time for sports, but his hobbies include going to museums and wandering cities, admiring the architecture. Next fall, he'll begin teaching graduate-level architecture. Lauded as a public speaker, he lives with two cats, one of whom can play fetch. There's nothing more attractive than a searing intellect, and this guy's as smart as they come.

Iris Robert, 24, Chef

An exotic beauty, she's half French, half Korean and 100 percent fascinating. Born in San Francisco into the famed Robert restaurant clan, she was raised in Belmont and attended UC Santa Cruz before transferring to Tufts to complete her BA. As chef de cuisine at Petit Robert Bistro in the South End, she's a rising star in the culinary world who enjoys trying new restaurants and says, "The one thing I've always dreamt for in a man is that he can cook." Fluent in French and Spanish, her hobbies include photography, and she never leaves the house without her camera. Out on the town, she's usually on the dance floor, and she takes West African and hip-hop dance classes. Besides working 13-hour days behind a 500-degree stove, she does yoga and jogs, but two of her major passions are skateboarding and snowboarding (which she tries to do at least once a week, in addition to an annual trip that will take her to the Alps this year). Last year, she volunteered to teach inner-city kids how to snowboard. An avid traveler, she has an English Staffordshire bull terrier named Chunk with whom she loves going to the beach any time of year. Like her, most of her friends are artists of some sort, and she enjoys galleries and museums. With a seemingly limitless array of interests and the energy of a nuclear reactor, she's gorgeous, fun and spontaneous, and any guy who could keep up with her would need to be equally impressive.

Amy Leydon, 33, Yoga Instructor

Grace and beauty accompanied by humor and strength, she was born and raised in Palmer, Mass., and attended Fitchburg State College—a fact she's proud of because "it's a reminder that you don't have to go to Harvard to be successful." A former TV producer for Boston's WB, she was nominated for an Emmy three times and won once for writing. She's now a yoga instructor at several of the city's top venues (Exhale and the Sports Club/L.A.). Avidly sought after as a private teacher, her client list reads like a Who's Who, and her acolytes often develop into friends. A serious traveler, she's been on safari in Tanzania and is going to Belize this month. Hiking, running and reading are major hobbies, and when she's out and about, she's probably catching some live music or theater. A special pleasure is going to a movie on a weekday afternoon, to see a film that offers its audience something to think about instead of just a place to eat popcorn. Spending as much time at the beach as possible is a priority, as is the search for the best margarita in town. In terms of charity, she's donated her time to such organizations as YogaHope, Pathways to Wellness, the DMSE Foundation and the Fit Girl program. She has a cat named Ozzy, so she takes exception to anyone who wants to have the "Are you a dog or a cat person?" conversation. Add to the package that she's quick-witted and loves to laugh, and we say, "Namaste, baby!"

Nancy Evans, 24, Project Analyst

Our gay bachelorette was born in Orlando and raised in Atlanta, earning a BA in English and feminist and gender studies cum laude from Bryn Mawr, where she was awarded a fellowship to study the division of domestic labor among coupled lesbian parents. A strong advocate for female-specific education and the development of communities of women, she eventually plans to pursue a PhD in women's studies or a related field. Currently, she works as an analyst at Mintz Levin, specializing in both public and government relations (which offers her a lot of face time with politicians) and is in a rotation with the affiliated consulting firm ML Strategies. "Massachusetts, and specifically Boston, is really setting the precedent for gay rights in the country, and I often remind myself how lucky I am to be young and out in such an accepting city," she says. In addition to sitting on the fundraising committee for BAGLY (Boston Alliance of Gay and Lesbian Youth), she administers Mintz Levin's pro bono Domestic Violence Project, which provides free legal services for victims of abuse. A devout foodie and oenophile, she's plugged into the fine-dining scene and wouldn't rule out a professional move into the restaurant business. She could wander the aisles of Formaggio Kitchen or any gourmet shop for hours, and loves to cook as much as to dine out. A practitioner of yoga, she has a cat named Franklin who shreds everything she owns. Devoted to pecan pie and NPR in no particular order, she'd be perfect for the cast of The L Word if the characters on that show were likable instead of so damned annoying.

Michael Anastasia, 29, Actor and Teacher

As part of Improv Asylum, his job goes beyond acting. In addition to improvising scenes taken from audience suggestions, he writes the scripted sections of the show. He also teaches classes in improvisational theater techniques to students, ranging in age from 17 to 70, and provides corporate training in listening and team building to employees at organizations like Red Bull, Raytheon, Harvard Business School and Dunkin' Donuts. Born in Worcester and raised in Northboro, he received a BA from Connecticut College and then studied in the prestigious Second City Conservatory program. A voracious reader, his hobbies include playing the guitar, snowboarding and sailing. An indie-rock enthusiast, he's always seeking out new music and goes to live shows whenever his schedule permits. He's also a whiskey connoisseur. For the last three years, he's produced and performed in No Rest for the Wicked Funny, a 24-hour improv show that benefits Globe Santa. Although an only child of an MD and a PhD, he swears they're proud of him, despite the fact that "I do comedy in the basement of a CVS." Quick on his feet and wet-your-pants funny, he's also got good looks and knows when to knock off the monkey business. "Since I'm usually in front of crowds or on stage, I don't really like loud bars when I go out," he says. "Usually, I just try to find a quiet spot where I can hear who I'm talking to." If that turns out to be you, you're guaranteed a good time.

Tina Wu, 29, Attorney

Seemingly a bundle of contradictions with a dizzying diversity of interests, she's a high-powered lawyer as well as a classically trained musician but still has time for numerous charities and hobbies. A native of Glennview, Ill., she finished her undergrad at the University of Illinois summa cum laude in three years and then went on to Harvard and Georgetown, all the while collecting honors and accolades like a Phi Beta Kappa key and numerous public service awards. She began her legal career at the Environmental Protection Agency and now practices at a white-shoe firm downtown. As a professional vocalist and violinist (she started performing music as a child), she sang with Opera Boston and played violin for two seasons with the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra. She's jammed at Johnny D's with indie-pop goddess Paula Kelley, has an album credit on Ad Frank's Is the World's Best Ex-Boyfriend and sings in the King's Chapel choir. A fanatical sailor, she's started racing small keelboats and this winter will race Etchells in the Jaguar Cup in Florida, as well as brave frostbite racing J-24s in Boston Harbor. ("If I could sail every single day, I would," she says.) A former board member of the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra and Community Rowing Inc., she's actively involved with charities and organizations too numerous to list and volunteers as a teacher in the Citizen Schools Legal Apprenticeship program, in addition to looking after the finances of two elderly, low-income women. At home, she has "an awesome little Betta fish" named Ben for company. She says her defining traits are curiosity, compassion and a sense of humor about life. We say it's exhausting just contemplating her life.

Dennis Wideman, 24, Boston Bruins Defenseman

One indication of this hockey player's overpowering appeal: At a recent autograph-signing event, the female fans were clamoring to get at the corn-fed cutie from Elmira, Ontario. Looking as good outside of his uniform as he does in black and gold, he loves to go fishing in his time off. He's also an avid golfer and plays in a number of fundraising tournaments. His other charitable involvement includes donating to several youth hockey leagues, visiting kids at children's hospitals and reading to little ones in programs both here and in Canada. In other words, there's both heart and brains behind the brawn. A dog lover whose hectic travel schedule won't allow him to have a pet, he's a member of the National Hockey League Players Association and has received numerous awards. Having grown up in a small town, he likes things laid-back and low-key, and he has a fondness for country music. The John Denver song goes, "Thank God I'm a country boy." We thank God this country boy's a Boston Bruin.

Anmol Mehra, 35, Equity Analyst

This witty and adventurous financial whiz was raised in Houston and went to both undergrad and grad school (for his MBA) at UT Austin. Five years ago, he moved here to work as an equity analyst at a large investment firm, compiling research on consumer stocks by doing financial analyses of companies, stores, etc., "hopefully picking the stocks that go up and not down." Although he still enjoys playing tourist, visiting all the great sites in Boston and throughout New England (personal favorites being the Berkshires, Block Island and Gloucester/Rockport), he remains a Texan at heart. He loves country music, knows how to two-step, still says "y'all," and his favorite TV show is Friday Night Lights. His hobbies include playing darts, reading multiple books at the same time (and taking far too long to finish any single one) and drinking Scotch. Sports include soccer, volleyball, kayaking and biking, and he keeps meaning to learn how to play the guitar but never seems to get around to it. A vegetarian, he enjoys trying any of Boston's ethnic restaurants, favorites being Oleana, Tangierino, Addis Red Sea and Orinoco. Having been in a band growing up, he loves to go see live music at venues like the Middle East, Toad and the Paradise, at least a few times per month. A true traveler, he's visited such far-flung destinations as Mongolia, Estonia, Croatia, Iceland, Scotland, Argentina, the Galapagos and Machu Picchu over the past few years. He also reads three newspapers a day. Iconoclastic without being antisocial and brainy without being a geek, he's got the charm to back it all up. Bonus points for being able to juggle.

Rachel Skerritt, 30, Novelist and High School Principal

If she was the principal at our school, we wouldn't mind getting sent to the office. Unbelievably accomplished at such a young age, she not only oversees 225 students and 20 teachers at a pilot school in Brighton, she just published her third novel, When the Lights Go Down. Her first two, No More Lies and Truth Be Told, met with both critical and popular success, and her nonfiction works include Have No Career Fear. A native of Dorchester, she attended Boston Latin (where she now sits on the board of trustees) and UPenn, where she made Dean's List and Phi Beta Kappa and got her graduate degree in education. Her weekly routine includes Pilates every Saturday, followed by a trip to Barnes and Noble for a caramel frappuccino and a dose of US Weekly. When she's not writing (novels, short stories or blogging), she's liable to be shopping ("Bloomingdale's is my second home," she jokes). In each of the past 10 years she's visited a different country, her favorites being China, Brazil and France. At the Hollywood Black Film Festival, she won the storyteller's award for her screenplay and she's garnered praise from Ebony and Essence magazines. Add to that the fact that she's hot as all get out, and it's obvious why any guy would be lucky to date her.

Steve Levy, 42, Sports Anchor

As the host of the national nightly 60-minute show that many highlight junkies can't live without—ESPN's Sportscenter—he's turned his fandom into a career as a major broadcaster. Because every show airs repeatedly, he's a stickler for getting it right, and he loves his job so much he's never sad when a vacation ends and he has to get back to work. (The three Emmys are another clue.) Although a native New Yorker, he's such a Boston fan that he lives here and commutes to work. He considers sleeping both a hobby and a skill and sees the treadmill as a necessary evil, both because of being on TV and a love of eating out. Admittedly unartistic, he jokes that his mother complains that he was the only kid in history who never brought home anything to stick on the refrigerator. He's played himself in four feature films—Fever Pitch, Mystery Alaska, The Ringer and The Gameplan—and is extremely close to his parents and sister, with whom he takes a vacation every summer. Involved in numerous sports-related charities, he hates dressing up when he doesn't have to and is most comfortable in shorts, a T-shirt, flip-flops and a baseball cap. Despite all the adulation that comes with being the sports fan's equivalent to the Oracle at Delphi, he's most proud of the time he took the show to Kuwait to spend a week with U.S. troops. "In a nutshell, I've just been so lucky my whole life in just about every aspect, and I realize that most of it is just that: luck," he says modestly. But if you ask us, there's more than a little talent, grit and charm, too.

Susan Walton, 40, Portfolio Manager

A native of Indiana, she grew up on Boston's North Shore but spent her summers on a ranch in southern Indiana, where her family bred race horses. Armed with an MBA from BU, she began her financial career in New York in 1994, working as a secretary at Merrill Lynch. Now, almost 15 years later, she has the job she used to dream about while answering phones and picking up other people's lunches. As a VP in the wealth management division of a giant financial corporation, she manages investments for institutions, wealthy families and high net-worth individuals, which basically means sifting through enormous amounts of data and making weighty decisions about other people's money. Rather than finding it stressful, she sees it as exhilarating and has a genuine passion for the economy and financial markets, joking that her yearbook designation would be "Person Most Likely to Crash a Federal Reserve Meeting." Equally as driven in her personal life, she's completed two marathons and hopes to compete in her first triathlon this year. She enjoys cycling in Maine and New Hampshire, loves the Red Sox and goes to the theater as often as possible. She's also an opera fan, Italian tragedies like Tosca and Rigoletto being her favorites. Besides sharing her home with two extremely spoiled cats, she's actively involved with Rosie's Place and spends Christmas and Easter mornings volunteering there. A successful businesswoman with an enormous heart, she's worth her market weight in gold.

Will Gilson, 25, Chef

Face it: Nothing's sexier than a chef, and when you add a dash of good looks along with a soupçon of edginess, you've got a potent recipe. After growing up in Groton, he spent two years apprenticing in the North End under chef Chuck Draghi (whom he both thanks and blames for his love of cooking). He then studied at Johnson and Wales' prestigious cooking program, and has worked under James Beard Award winner Ana Sortun. Now, at an age when a lot of other cooks are still learning how to peel potatoes, he's the rising star at the sleek Cambridge gastropub Garden at the Cellar, being hailed by critics as the Second Coming. Even a notoriously persnickety food scribe like the Globe's Alison Arnett has waxed breathless about him being "a natural." An amateur harmonica player (emphasis on amateur), he's a talented photographer, an interest he intends to pursue more now that he's moved into the Brickbottom Artists Studios. Active with Chef's Collaborative, which bridges the gap between cooks and their food sources, he's helping to save the planet by making sustainable choices at Garden and teaching others to do the same. In his spare time, he eats and drinks at other restaurants, likes to see live music, and will try to rearrange his schedule around a Red Sox game but is just as content with a good, strong gin and tonic. Remember his name. You'll be hearing a lot more of it.

April Soderstrom, 23, Designer

Don't let her dewy youth fool you; she's packed as much into her few years as many people do in a lifetime. An interior designer for an architecture firm, she spends her days doing everything from getting her hands dirty helping with construction on La Verdad to picking out accessories for the guest rooms at the Liberty Hotel, her area of interest being hospitality design. A Michigan native, she graduated magna cum laude from Central Michigan University, and being a true Michigander, she loves doing anything outdoors: hiking, camping, boating, fishing, beaching, you name it. For stress relief, she heads to the gym. For 10 years, she was a gymnast (admitting that she once fell off the beam on purpose because the wedgie her leotard was giving her was taking the show a little too far). As craftsy as they come, she enjoys pottery, painting and even quilting (yes, you read that right), saying, "I can't count the number of times I've seriously burnt my fingers with a hot glue gun." Her French bulldog, Louis, is "half pig and half bunny," and she's so in love with him she wonders whether it disqualifies her to be described as a bachelorette. To us, it means she's an excellent catch.

Nick Johnson, 26, Sommelier and Restaurant Manager

As the front-of-the-house guy at the award-winning Craigie Street Bistrot, he works with the incredibly talented chef Tony Maws, but we suspect that lots of regulars come to see him as much as they do for the food. Responsible for wine purchasing, menu pairings, and general customer advice and counsel, he's the consummate hospitality man. Born in New York City and raised there and in Wellesley (with summers at his family's place in Hyannisport), he attended the Buckley School in Manhattan, Fessenden and then Deerfield, where he was captain of the squash team. At Denison, he played on the country's sixth-ranked team. He cut his teeth in the restaurant business with stints at Blue Ginger and L'Espalier before becoming manager of Sel de la Terre. In addition to being a superb cook, he enjoys hiking, fishing, racket sports, music and travel. A member of the Museum of Fine Arts, he collects wine and is a political news junkie. Memberships include the Hyannisport Golf Club, Deerfield and Denison alumni associations, and the Iron Chef Louie Dinner Club (an unpretentious supper club that's somewhere between a tasting and a frat party and geared toward 20- and 30-somethings). Despite the rarefied background, he's utterly down-to-earth, and as one of the city's hottest up-and-comers in the restaurant business, he's a catch and a half.

Marina Kalb, 45, Boutique Owner

A journalist by training, she has worked at the New York Times, ABC News and for the PBS documentary series Frontline, and now (in a bit of a 180) co-owns Portobello Road, the white-hot boho-chic lifestyle boutique in Chestnut Hill. The daughter of legendary newsman Bernard Kalb, she was raised in Hong Kong and spent a year and a half in Paris. She attended Tufts, where she was editor of the newspaper and graduated cum laude. Her store sells everything from women's and children's clothing to toothbrushes and candlesticks, and since opening in the fall has become the go-to source among the smart set. An inveterate globe-trotter whose idea of adventure involves vacationing and spending time with her two young sons, she's passionate about books, politics and poker, although she admits to being lousy. A yoga and pilates practitioner ("an inversion a day keeps the doctor away"), she also enjoys tennis, swimming and skiing. As with everything else, her taste in music is eclectic, ranging from Sting to opera, and she considers museums and theater mandatory to one's good health. A big-time Red Sox and Celtics fan, she is a trustee of the Children's Museum and chair of the Xchange (a professional women's group in Boston), in addition to supporting numerous causes like Doctors Without Borders. "My parents always told me that it was my responsibility to be interesting. That motto has guided me in my life," she says. Obviously, it's served her well. An Emmy Award winner with a flawless sense of style and a fantastic sense of humor, she's proof that intensity can also equal sexy.

Katelyn Prominski, 24, Ballerina

As the song in A Chorus Line goes, "Everything's beautiful at the ballet," and this stunning brunette addition to Boston Ballet's corps proves it's true. A native of the Washington, D.C., area, she went to Georgetown Visitation Prep and then studied at the San Francisco Ballet School. With Boston Ballet, she appears regularly on stage at the Wang Center and the Opera House and has toured overseas, most recently in Spain and Scotland. When she's not performing or rehearsing, you're likely to find her enjoying Wednesday-night libations, Sunday brunch, walking around the city and trying to pick up phrases in foreign languages (she speaks some Spanish, Dutch, Lithuanian and Arabic). Still, she reserves her love of singing for when she's in the shower. More impressively, she designs a line of dancewear sold nationally but made more for her friends. "If we have to wear leotards all day long, they might as well be original, one-of-a-kind styles," she says. In addition to dabbling in modeling, her passions include fashion, travel, yoga and chilling on the beach. Among her charitable involvements is the Dancers Resource Fund (for whom she's staged a fashion show fundraiser). Any guy hoping to woo her would stand a better chance if he arrived with fresh flowers and/or cupcakes in hand. Spending as much time as possible with her large and close-knit family is a top priority. A latter-day Audrey Hepburn, she's got style, grace and the gentleness that belies impressive strength. Brava!

Brandon Rudat, 28, News Anchor

As handsome in person as he is telegenic, our gay bachelor is an anchor/reporter for WHDH Channel 7. Off the air, the polished look gives way to ripped jeans, sneakers and "always, always a hat." A product of the OC (apparently everyone there actually can plane a board with their cheekbones), he went to NYU to study journalism and political science. He landed his first job in TV by sneaking past security at NBC and saying he'd work on the Today Show for free. Next thing he knew, he was running scripts for Ann Curry. Last summer, he won an Emmy for a story on a sex offender who was chief of a fire department, and he keeps the statuette in his living room so that friends can deliver impromptu acceptance speeches. A natural athlete, he played soccer in Europe (Sweden, France and Spain) and plays tennis nearly every week. He also has a ski house in Utah, and has been snowboarding since before he was a teenager. (A bigger deal than it sounds, since Alta and Deer Valley are among the few mountains where boarders are banned. He takes pride in having been kicked off.) In a bold move, he took all his money out of the stock market and invests in artwork instead, and he also paints, calling it "the best stress-reliever in the world." He volunteers with a group that helps cancer patients by giving them money directly to pay their bills, saying, "To me, that's just as important as research." His personal motto—work hard, play harder—characterizes his approach to everything. Imagine if Anderson Cooper had dark hair, was out of the closet and knew how to have fun. That would be Brandon Rudat.

John Michael Earle, 25, Fashion Designer/Retailer

The brilliant young entrepreneur behind the phenomenally successful Johnny Cupcakes fashion line, he was born in Boston and raised in Hull and Nantasket Beach. After graduating from the South Shore Charter School (where he now sits on the board), he tried college but dropped out to build his clothing empire. In addition to shops on Newbury Street and the South Shore, his clothing is sold internationally at specialty stores and boutiques and his e-commerce business is booming. When not developing his brand, Earle travels to guest-lecture about branding, fashion and entrepreneurship. He likes going out for breakfast, brunch, lunch, dinner, dessert and midnight snacks, collecting pinball machines and other memorabilia from his childhood, traveling, hosting dinner parties (where he attempts to cook), browsing antiques stores and spending as much time as his busy schedule will allow with family and friends. For fun, you're liable to find him sledding, playing wiffleball, Frisbee, mini golf, ping-pong, darts, candlepin bowling and especially skeeball, as well as boogie-boarding. Creative pursuits include drawing, design, photography and fashion, and he's also partial to sailing, building sandcastles, barbecues, chasing ice cream trucks, road trips, Martha's Vineyard, the Red Sox, water-balloon fights and theme parks. Actively involved with numerous charities and generous with both his time and money, he doesn't drink or do drugs. An overgrown kid trapped inside a hottie's body, he's all that and a bag of chips.

Abbie Barrett, 30, Singer/Songwriter

A native New Yorker, this lovely songbird was a vocalist for the Adam Ezra Group for five years before launching her solo career in 2007, and already things are beginning to happen for her. One example: She was a WXRV "The River" Homegrown Artist this month. A graduate of Colgate University, she paints and does some creative writing in addition to spending as much time as possible outdoors, reading or going to hear live music. As funny as she is talented, she describes her professional duties as "writing songs, playing them and hoping nobody's ears bleed." Her charitable endeavors include playing a lot of benefit concerts and lending her voice to help such causes as Women for Women International, the Pine Street Inn and Hurricane Katrina relief. Fun facts: She has a cat named Noodles, was a champion badminton player in high school and her favorite color is blue. Another fun fact: "If I were to have one superpower, it would be the ability to find parking whenever, wherever, immediately." Quirky, charming and utterly original, she looks incredibly sexy with a guitar strapped around her neck, and we predict you'll be hearing a lot more from her as her career continues to blossom.

Lance Eliot Gaines, 27, Firefighter

If you consider firemen heroes the way we do, this guy's verging on the super. A native of the Boston area, he studied architecture at Northeastern and Wentworth, then joined the Brookline fire department. It's a job that, he points out, involves more than battling fires. "It's really an array of emergency responses, from car accidents to medical emergencies." When he's not risking life and limb, he's either playing basketball or fencing, and his brother recently turned him on to big-game hunting, which has him looking forward to next fall. A car enthusiast and serious traveler, he also cultivates his love of architecture and art. Although he grew up around dogs, he doesn't currently have a pet. What he does have is a pair of roommates—a publicist and an amateur boxer—whom he calls his best friends. With them or others, he gets out when he can. He's a guy's guy and a girl's fantasy. We love a man in uniform, especially when it means that he's good in a crisis situation and knows how to put the interests of others ahead of his own.

SERIOUS Chic

When it comes to fashion . . .

Meghan Allen means business.

With creative clients who "unknowingly critique every detail," Meghan Allen needs one put-together look. So when Allen, who does business development for Office Environments of New England, gets dressed in the morning, she chooses wisely. Because pitching outside-the-box products doesn't mesh with cookie-cutter clothing.

By Amanda Knorr Photographs by Michael Piazza

"They're artists, really," 35-year-old Allen says of her customers (mainly architects and designers). "They don't like you to be in a suit all the time. They notice texture, color and fabrics. You want to dress fun and different." She turns to labels like Trina Turk, Marc Jacobs and Diane von Furstenburg to add flair to her structured Theory ensembles.

Style comes naturally to Allen, who spent six years as an interior designer. "I like having things nobody else has, and I try to make my outfits a little bit different by adding fun shoes and chunky jewelry, or a fun skirt and boots," she explains. She treasure hunts for items at Turtle in the South End and Habit in South Boston, where she lives with her husband.

Once Allen leaves the house for the day, her attire must carry her through many events—from 9 am meetings to 7 pm dinners and fundraisers. Comfy, stylish shoes are a must. Her preference? "Stuart Weitzman. I have a skinny foot, so they seem to fit the best." In terms of pocketbooks, she favors Cynthia Rowley and Kooba. "I'm not into the logo bags. I don't like anything to be too flashy or showy."

Or inappropriate, which means denim on the weekends and not in the office. "I'll put on a stylish pair of jeans or a fun top that I can't wear to work." As for her overall look—"I think I know what works and what doesn't." It's a fashion trait that also makes good business sense. ✖✖✖

ROME IS WHERE THE HEART IS

Friends, Bostonians, countrymen, I come to praise the American Repertory Theatre's new production of Julius Caesar, not to bury it. While the evil that men do lives after them, the good is oft interred with last month's theater reviews; so be it with Spamalot, anyway. The noble Brutus, here played by Jim True-Frost (best known as Prez on HBO's The Wire, with James Waterson and Thomas Derrah, from left), hath told you Caesar was ambitious. If it were so, it was less a grievous fault than an artistic conceit of updating Shakespeare's play with references to 1960s America. You know: social tumult, political assassination and oodles of modern relevance. Director Arthur Nauzyciel has an international reputation for brilliant staging that hews close to the playwright's original meaning. Which makes him an honorable man.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Atonement ★★★ Director Joe Wright, who helmed 2005's rollicking, dynamic take on Pride and Prejudice, reteams with Keira Knightley, this time to tackle Ian McEwan's epic WWII downer. The first hour suggests we might be in for a masterpiece, as cinematographer Seamus McGarvey's camera restlessly prowls through the English country estate where Knightley's poor little rich girl pines for James McAvoy's hapless gardener. Class resentments simmer; sexual tensions sizzle; and a few tragic misunderstandings hurtle things headlong into disaster. Then along comes that pesky war, and Christopher Hampton's screenplay switches gears into more abstract, literary territory, and these vibrant flesh-and-blood characters recede into symbols. Wright desperately tries to hold our attention with an array of visual trickery, but even a breathtakingly staged, unbroken steadicam shot, winding its way around thousands of extras at the Dunkirk evacuation, can't touch the close-quartered intimacy of those early reels. The final kicker is a purely literary flourish, one that connects in the head but not the heart. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Bucket List ★½ There's not a schmaltzy self-help cliché that doesn't show up somewhere in Justin Zackham's screenplay for this soppy tearjerker, which stars Jack Nicholson and Morgan Freeman as terminal cancer patients who embark on a wild road trip and learn banal life lessons along the way. No points for guessing that Nicholson's sardonic, loutish billionaire discovers all sorts of wisdom from the sage, salt-of-the-earth Freeman. Why is an actor as dynamic as Freeman so often cast as a healing force of neutered sanctimony? Does anybody remember his terrifying breakthrough performance as a vicious pimp in 1987's Street Smart? The man can do more than nod and teach people how to be good. Director Rob Reiner laughably phones it in, as this alleged globetrotting adventure has quite brazenly been photographed on a Los Angeles soundstage. There hasn't been such shameless use of stock footage and shots of actors in front of fake backgrounds since the late '30s. (At Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Cassandra's Dream ★½ Another tired trawl through a godless universe from Woody Allen, who these days seems to approach his annual directorial effort with an air of resignation. Working the same terrain as his 1989 masterpiece Crimes and Misdemeanors, a film he's been remaking incessantly lately, Cassandra's Dream stars Ewan McGregor and Colin Farrell as working-class blokes with dodgy accents who find themselves ensnared in a half-written murder plot, thanks to an insufficiently frightening uncle played by Tom Wilkinson. Allen's on autopilot to the point of self-parody, dropping laughably unsubtle references to Greek tragedy and forcing his characters to stand around for scenes on end discussing the heaviness of the film's incoherent themes. McGregor brays his way through a role that's mostly exposition, but Farrell comes off slightly better by playing up his often unremarked vulnerability. Woody Allen films used to be cultural events. Lately, they feel more like obligations. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Charlie Wilson's War ★★½ It should have been the movie of the year. Begging for pointed satire, the true-life saga of a Texas congressman (Tom Hanks) covertly arming and training the Afghan mujahideen is a ripe example of American victories coming back to bite us on the backside. But, working from a sharp and extremely funny script by West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin (here making amends for his odious Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip), director Mike Nichols chickens out by softening all the body-blows with broad comedic flourishes and abruptly pulling the plug before the logical ending. Still, Hanks is a joy to watch as the debauched do-gooder, bantering back and forth with Philip Seymour Hoffman's movie-stealing CIA crank. Wildly miscast as a voracious millionaire man-eater, Julia Roberts does a lousy Susan Sarandon impression. There are enough meaty moments to make the film almost worthwhile, but it's too bad Nichols pulled so many punches. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Cloverfield ★★½ A triumph of gimmickry from huckster JJ Abrams, this savvily constructed bit of stuntwork purports to be camcorder footage found after a devastating attack by a giant lizard, who we can only assume isn't called Godzilla due to copyright restrictions. Basically The Blair Witch Project's dumber, bigger-budget sibling, Cloverfield begins at an insufferable party full of vapid Manhattan 20-somethings, then sends us on a shaky, handheld nightmare through panicked streets after the inane love story is rudely interrupted by the Statue of Liberty's decapitation. If you can forget the hundreds of preposterous logistical quandaries—

Rambo
★½
Starring Sylvester Stallone, Julie Benz, Paul Schulze and a ton of cannon fodder. Written by Art Monterastelli and Stallone. Based on a character created by David Morrell. Directed by Stallone. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

SSSHH... nobody tell Sylvester Stallone what year it is.

A sad and grotesque spectacle, the curiously titled Rambo arrives a full two decades after the world was decidedly underwhelmed by Rambo III.

We can blame the modest sleeper success of 2006's Rocky Balboa for Stallone's latest misadventure in the wayback machine. Jabbing his way out of direct-to-video purgatory, Stallone played on our collective nostalgia for the Italian Stallion, offering up a sentimental fifth sequel that was sincere, clunky and surprisingly endearing for a film that really wasn't very good. Everybody loves Rocky, and despite the increasingly awful films that followed, the 1976 original still holds up as one of the most heartfelt and rousing pictures of an excellent era. Just try watching it again without crying; it's better than you remember.

Rambo is an entirely different story. Like Rocky, here is another Stallone character severely perverted after a decent arrival on the big screen. Sure, nobody will make any claims for Ted Kotcheff's First Blood as being great art, but working from a dark, violent novel by David Morrell, it tells the simple story of a traumatized Vietnam veteran who comes home to find himself ostracized by his fellow countrymen. He's almost the action-movie version of Bruce Springsteen's "Born in the U.S.A."—except Rambo also blew up gas stations and carried an awesome knife. First Blood was conceived in the same spirit of Paul Schrader and John Flynn's underrated Rolling Thunder, or Schrader and Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver, which explores what happens when young men are turned into killers, then sent back into society.

It wasn't until Rambo: First Blood Part II, which Stallone penned alongside a fledgling screenwriter by the name of James Cameron, that the most craven, narcissistic parts of his personality began to obscure this formerly life-sized character. In 1985, the same year that Rocky won the Cold War by beating the tar out of Dolph Lundgren, Rambo went back to Vietnam, machine-gunned a bunch of Soviets and North Vietnamese, and brought the boys home while finally answering a question he asked before the opening credits exploded into flames: "Do we get to win this time?"

The formula is disgusting but effective, at least as box office receipts and pop iconography go. Considering Stallone's track record of cashing in on the nation's sore spots with his brand of wish fulfillment, it's surprising that Rambo's not taking on Al Qaeda this time around. One can easily imagine Stallone delivering a teary monologue and Osama Bin Laden's severed head to Richard Crenna before the credits roll.

But no, this time we're in Myanmar, where a benevolent group of missionaries (led by Paul Schulze, the sleazy priest from The Sopranos) hope to bring prayer books and medicine to the Karen tribe, currently being exterminated by the Burmese junta. These good folks have heard of an American longboat operator in Thailand who can take them across the border, and sure enough it's John Rambo.

Rambo is sad. He fishes with a bow and arrow and seldom speaks, though he still enjoys wearing goofy headbands. Director Stallone spends the first half of the movie fetishizing the inhuman cruelty currently going on in Myanmar by lavishing endless close-ups on bayoneted babies, sexual assault, torture and the reflection of burning villages in the mirrored sunglasses of Muang Muang Khin's sadistic Burmese general.

I wish all this exploitative footage served as a geopolitical wake-up call, but it's just an excuse for Rambo to get crazy angry. Pausing to note via voiceover that "killing's as easy as breathing, when you're pushed," our hero blacksmiths his own machete and promptly lays waste to the entire Burmese army. After

There are geysers of viscera but nothing resembling basic filmmaking competence.

60 years of civil war, they finally threatened the wrong white people and pissed off a former American movie star. Now there's hell to pay.

Paying no attention to pesky matters like spatial geography or screen direction, Stallone devises an orgy of mayhem that plunks the 61-year-old at the turret of a .50-caliber machine gun and reveres the way an anti-aircraft weapon can shred the human body. There are geysers of viscera, countless severed limbs and exploding heads, but nothing remotely resembling basic filmmaking competence. Stallone comes off like Mel Gibson, with all the creepy, psychosexual, violent hang-ups but lacking the crucial visual prowess.

Rambo looks shoddy and cheap, indistinguishable from any cruddy '80s grindhouse craptacular like The Exterminator or the collected work of Golan and Globus.

Sometimes you can't go home again. Just don't tell Sly; he obviously thinks it's still 1988. ✖✖✖ something that shouldn't be difficult, as the movie is already about a skyscraper-sized monster—it's a bracing ride. Kudos to the ground-level perspective and queasy, you-are-there immediacy maintained by director Matt Reeves and cinematographer Michael Bonvillian. Clocking in at less than 90 minutes, Cloverfield has the good sense to end just when the novelty is starting to wear off. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Diving Bell and the Butterfly ★★½

Formerly a famous irritant on the 1980s New York art scene, painter Julian Schnabel has evolved into a fascinating filmmaker, helming unconventional, if spotty, biographical pieces boasting kicky, exploratory visuals. The Diving Bell and the Butterfly tells the tale of Elle magazine editor Jean-Dominique Bauby, felled by a stroke and unable to move anything but his left eyelid. The condition, described here as "locked-in syndrome," hardly kept Bauby from penning his memoirs. It just took a bit more work than expected. Schnabel shoots huge chunks of the movie from his protagonist's point of view, the screen cutting to black as he communicates by blinking. As Bauby, Mathieu Almeric, the Roman Polanski look-alike who stole so many scenes in Steven Spielberg's Munich, brings a dry wit to the narration and finds sneaky ways around his role's obvious restrictions. Like Schnabel's Basquiat and Before Night Falls, Diving Bell is maddeningly inconsistent but has a lyrical sense of freedom. It's anything but locked-in. (At Coolidge Corner.)

I Am Legend ★★★ For a large portion of its running time, director Francis Lawrence's stark and handsomely mounted take on Richard Matheson's oft-filmed novel has a bracing sense of despair and an intelligence uncommon for a mega-budget blockbuster starring Will Smith. The former Fresh Prince dials down his trademark self-regard quite effectively as the sole survivor of a plague that's turned the world's population into sunlight-averse, poorly computer-animated zombies. The real star of the film is New York City, which has never appeared so desolate and empty. There is a stillness that's seriously unnerving. Smith's last man standing is drifting perilously close to dementia, and Lawrence punishes him with carefully crafted, prolonged suspense sequences. The movie is so smart and so dark for so long, you start to wonder when the Hollywood rubbish is going to begin. Then come the explosions and nonsense and pandering speeches about faith. Still, two-thirds of a great movie is better than nothing. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Juno ★★ The season's most insufferable dialogue comes courtesy of stripper turned screenwriter Diablo Cody, who penned this unbearably precious tale of teenage pregnancy that's more concerned with glib one-liners and arcane pop culture references than recognizable human emotion. The overqualified cast includes Ellen Page as a precocious and knocked-up 16-year-old, and Superbad's Michael Cera, pricelessly inarticulate as the baby daddy. Dependable character actors JK Simmons, Jason Bateman and Allison Janney wrestle whatever feeling they can out of Cody's one-note smarm, but director Jason Reitman undercuts their efforts with too-cute flourishes and an aura of smug self-satisfaction rivaling that of his similarly over-praised debut, Thank You for Smoking. Juno is already a hit, which is no surprise considering how much it aims to flatter its target audience. Mileage may vary, depending on your tolerance for hipster affectations. Personally, I felt like I was trapped in Allston past my bedtime. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

No Country for Old Men ★★★★ Adapted from the 2005 novel by Cormac McCarthy, Joel and Ethan Coen's No Country for Old Men is an enthralling, devastating movie experience. Stripped to the bone, it's a model of ruthless narrative efficiency that blossoms into something much larger than the sum of its precision-tooled parts. What at first seems like the simple saga of two tough hombres and a bag of money eventually attains a mythic, almost Biblical grandeur. For days afterwards, it haunts your dreams—the bad ones. The Coens have at last gone back to their roots, infusing No Country with the clockwork meticulousness and parched landscapes of their killer 1984 debut, Blood Simple. The movie is almost unbearably suspenseful and boasts the filmmakers' trademark strain of sicko gallows humor. But there's also something new here: a palpable sense of sorrow and genuine emotional resonance. For the first time in their brilliant career, it finally feels like the merry pranksters are out to do more than crack themselves up. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Orphanage ★★★ Though slow to start and a bit derivative in the story department, director JA Bayona's skillfully assembled ghost story relies on strong performances and some fine filmmaking to conjure a sufficient cloud of dread. The sympathetic Belén Rueda stars as a kindhearted mom attempting to refurbish and reopen the spacious seaside orphanage where she grew up. But when her sickly son (Roger Príncep) goes missing, the old walls begin to creak with some dark, long-buried secrets. That stray, angry little boy wearing the burlap sack over his face can't be a good sign either. Pan's Labyrinth director Guillermo del Toro produced, and the screenplay by Sergio G. Sánchez borrows a bit too liberally from that picture, as well as del Toro's The Devil's Backbone and Alejandro Amenábar's The Others. But any nagging sense of familiarity is ultimately offset by Bayona's directorial chops, the smart, patient way he builds suspense, and Rueda's emotional commitment to even the screenplay's most fantastical conceits. (At Waltham Embassy.)

Persepolis ★★★½ Buoyant and irreverent, Marjane Satrapi's best-selling coming-of-age comic book memoir springs to life as the simplicity of black-and-white line drawings trump the computer-generated marvels we've grown accustomed to. Growing up as an outspoken female in Iran sounds like the formula for a movie far less lively, but the tone boasts a sardonic wit matching that of its spitfire heroine. (No surprise then that Satrapi directed the film along with French animator Vincent Paronnaud.) Her childhood memories of the Shah's fall and the subsequent rise of Islamic fundamentalism offer a refreshing, humanistic point of view on Middle Eastern history. Young Satrapi's punk-rock attitude and black-market Iron Maiden cassettes lead to a brief exile in Vienna before she returns and, quite movingly, attempts to assimilate into a culture where she's no longer welcome. Persepolis is funny, rambling and sad, and a welcome reminder that stubborn individualism can be found where we least expect it. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Savages ★★★½ Grim, funny and unsentimental, writer-director Tamara Jenkins' follow-up to her 1998 dysfunctional-family comedy, Slums of Beverly Hills, stars Philip Seymour Hoffman and Laura Linney as sour-puss siblings facing difficult decisions as their estranged, abusive father (Philip Bosco) heads toward dementia. If you think this is going to be a sweet comedy of familial reconciliation, take another look at that surname. Muted in tone and clad beneath a brilliantly shabby production design, The Savages has a humdrum grit often missing even from indie movies. The more unsavory aspects of contemporary eldercare are confronted in a similarly blunt fashion with a minimum of speechifying. Hoffman and Linney are, as usual, extraordinary. Like most siblings facing a crisis, they fall back into the roles assigned to them in childhood. There's no grand deathbed catharsis and no monologues about lessons learned. When all is said and done, the characters have merely slouched ever so slightly closer to adulthood. The movie feels tough, and true. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street ★★★ This isn't your kid sister's musical. Drenched in rivers of blood, Sweeney Todd is a black-hearted, at times disgustingly comic meditation on the price of vengeance. As luck would have it, Steven Sondheim's gory extravaganza is exactly what director Tim Burton needed to get his groove back. Sweeney Todd is his best picture in years—ghoulishly delightful and subversive. There is a clarity and completeness of vision marking a welcome return to Burton's mischievous Goth sensibility. Johnny Depp stars as the wronged barber who sates his thirst for retribution by slitting the throats of his customers and tossing their corpses into the basement, where his daffy old landlady (played with dizzy deadpan timing by Helena Bonham Carter) grinds up the bodies and bakes them into pies. Depp and Bonham Carter are wonderful, save for one teensy caveat: They can't sing. Burton's swooping, inventive camerawork and the soul-stirring orchestrations too often soar towards transcendence, only to be dragged down by the pedestrian vocalizing. Indie-rockers Vampire Weekend bridge the campus, Cape and Congo

Tim Soter

VAMPIRE WEEKEND embraces the irony of its identity. In a playful nod to their clean-cut grafting of African music to indie-rock, the Brooklyn quartet coined the terms "Upper West Side Soweto" and "Cape Cod Kwassa Kwassa" to describe their style. So the band can understand another label cast in a positive light by the New York Times: "preppie Afro-pop."

As singer-guitarist Ezra Koenig puts it, "I like the idea of things getting mixed together and that things shouldn't be thought of as so distinct that they can't come together."

The mix-up begins with the group's name, inspired by a half-baked student film after Koenig's freshman year at Columbia University. "It involved someone going to Cape Cod to kill vampires," he says. And then there's the hybrid-happy sound, drawing on Afro-pop, chamber music and post-punk influences such as the Clash, XTC and Talking Heads.

"When you want to avoid cliches—and you want to have a band with rock instruments and not just be another rock band—one of the first things you have to do is think about all the other music you like," says Koenig, 23.

He met keyboardist-singer Rostam Batmanglij, bassist

Chris Baio and drummer Christopher Tomson at Columbia—and yes, they've been known to sport boat shoes, khakis and button-downs. They launched Vampire Weekend two years ago with modest ambitions. What began as a desire to play in the ballroom of a Riverside Drive fraternity grew into studio sessions that have spawned the group's eponymous debut and a headlining tour that hits the Museum of Fine Arts Feb. 9.

Batmanglij, who lent string and woodwind arrangements to the CD, and Tomson were music majors at Columbia. Koenig pursued an English degree and taught eighth-graders in Bedford-Stuyvesant following graduation. But, he adds, "Deep down, we always wanted to have careers in music."

Koenig also absorbed perspective from traveling in India and London. "I used to think a lot about colonialism and, more generally, in the way that cultures fuse and leave their imprints," the guitarist says. He envisioned a "postcolonial mashup" of music that included British ska, part of his father's record collection, alongside Afro-pop.

"I definitely liked the English Beat," Koenig says of the ska-rockers echoed in the clean, choppy guitar attack of "A-Punk" on Vampire Weekend. "British ska is one of the best examples of a kind of music that's really a hybrid of two things, but feels so natural," he says from Manhattan. "Those bands had their own style. You couldn't really see the seams. They were bringing together Jamaican music and elements of punk that were going on at the same time."

Vampire Weekend keeps its sound surprisingly natural, sparse and sunny. "A lot of the music that we talked about when we first got together was very minimal," says Koenig, although he notes that he and Batmanglij share a love for hip-hop producers like Timbaland. "So it can be a challenge when you want to bring all sorts of different things into [the music], but still keep it at that minimal place. It's also about avoiding things like distortion. That's an easy way to keep things light and clean and get the right vibe."

When it comes to a lyrical vibe, the singer also keeps it light—and closer to home, opining on mansard roofs, odd punctuation, napping after class and getting off Cape Cod.

However, apart from some trips when Koenig was a kid, no one in the band has ever been to the Cape. "Cape Cod Kwassa Kwassa"—which partly refers to a Congolese soukous style—is named after a story that Koenig wrote for a senior fiction workshop about a depressed Cornell freshman reminiscing about time on the Cape with his mom.

"The mom was a liberal, classic baby-boomer and it had to do with the kind of world music that they listened to in the car," Koenig says. "So it was a very nostalgic thing." Sounds a tad like the bloodline of Vampire Weekend. ***

I Sing of Arms and the Man...

Bunch of Musers The ancient Greeks didn't think mere mortals could make great art. The Muse of epic poetry, Calliope, got the credit for inspiring Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, about the tragedy of war and the journey home once the fighting ends. So it's fitting that on Feb. 16, Boston's own Calliope—a young ensemble of 50 singers and instrumentalists—presents Battle and Peace at Harvard's Memorial Hall. The diverse program includes a choral arrangement of Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings (the mournful theme song from Platoon), and proceeds benefit the New England Shelter for Homeless Veterans.

A Heated Debate

Warm up to the Idea

Temperatures are rising, ice caps are melting—in the words of Nelly, "It's gettin' hot in herre." Now the Montserrat College of Art Gallery has joined the green movement with the exhibition It's Getting Hot in Here, featuring works created using environmentally conscious materials and methods. Pieces made of fruit stickers, recycled plastic bottles and bread tags may satisfy even the most ardent reusable-tote-bag aficionados. To refute another famed performer, maybe it is easy being green.

Need to vent?

If everyone kept their feelings bottled up like warm beer, we'd soon have antisocial behavior exploding all over the place and ruining the upholstery.

So send us your letters of love and spleen, and we'll print them for the world to see!

Remember When

Soul Man One guy doesn't recall events from his past. What he can't remember, some other guy remarkably can. Sound like an M. Night Shyamalan movie? Think again. It's the premise of The Soul Thief, which author Charles Baxter discusses at the First Parish Church in Cambridge Feb. 12. The event is sure to be illuminating, and while you might not remember everything you hear, whoever's sitting next to you will probably be able to fill in the gaps.

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

HUMID NATURE

[JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18]
If, over the next two weeks, you want to hide out by yourself, it may be hard to find the time. While the sun is in Aquarius, you could feel that a psychic spotlight is tracking your every move, especially after the new moon/solar eclipse on Feb. 6. Although it comes out of retrograde Feb. 18, Mercury doesn't leave Aquarius until March 14. Plus—and this can significantly boost the popularity of the well-loved Water Bearer—magnetic Venus enters your sign Feb. 17 and won't exit until March 12.

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
While retrograde Mercury merges with your Neptune ruler, it'll be easier to understand what you have in mind. Since Fish tend to be more visual than verbal, this often isn't the case. However, while the two planets are in close quarters, why not use the Messenger to recite your poems or post your music video online? The Aquarius sun adds its creative power to your plans on Feb. 10 when it conjuncts imaginative Neptune. Beautiful and compelling as your vision may be, remember to share it with your audience.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
I assume Rams made plans far enough in advance to not be thrown off course when your Mars ruler shifted out of retrograde last week. If you can keep to your schedule, you'll be in a much better position to benefit from the fortunate collaboration of Venus and Jupiter in your Capricorn career zone. Maybe the well-meaning people these planets represent will ask a bit more of you, but once the extra effort is made, there'll be kudos from your peers as well as your boss. One of them might even become an integral part of your Valentine's Day celebration.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
You could be exposed to someone or something at the solar eclipse on Feb. 6 that dramatically affects your prognosis for the future, but in a good way. A favorable connection from progressive Uranus to your Venus ruler that day can personalize the message the cosmos is sending. The Bull's challenge is to separate the wheat from the chaff, the true interpretation from the false. Since impressionable Neptune is especially active at that time, this won't be as easy as it seems. You wanna be a believer, not a deceiver.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Like your Taurus neighbor, the Twins are being influenced by another potent planetary aspect the same day the Aquarius new moon/solar eclipse is putting on its show. And while you won't be able to see it, you'll feel the effects of your Mercury ruler's merger with the sun, especially if the conjunction brings up something from the past that is relevant today. Remember, Mercury is running in reverse until Feb. 18. Also note that Mercury hangs with drinking, drugging Neptune for Mardi Gras, the Chinese New Year and beyond.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
Too bad you won't enjoy the sight of the annular solar eclipse; still, the Moon Child could feel a surge of power while Luna makes Sol disappear. Since these phenomena often mark turning points, keep an eye on how the candidates who have sun-ruled Leo prominent in their charts (Obama, Ron Paul and even Clinton, a solar Scorpio) fared on Super Tuesday. No Cancers or Aquarians are in the running. Valentine's Day may be a karmic experience for a soft-hearted Crab; better adopt a hard-shell, hard-ass attitude instead.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
Read for Cancer so you'll be properly prepared for the loss of ego gratification you may experience during the first solar eclipse of the year. The second takes place Aug. 1 when your sun ruler is in your own sign. Valentine's Day could become more of a social event than a romantic occasion; if you want it to be private, keep your plans to yourself. No boasting about how special or how lavish it'll be. Remember, while Mercury is retrograde in your Aquarius house of partners, it'll be hard to read what's going on in his or her head.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22]
The workaholic Virgin should be aware that the solar eclipse on Feb. 6 takes place in your Aquarius house of successful work and health practices, the area that'll need your attention for more than a week or two. Since your Mercury ruler is running in reverse in that sign, it would be wise to double-check the data you're receiving on the job, as well as info about medicine, supplements and food. I don't want to make you more paranoid than you already are, but while restrictive Saturn is in Virgo, you need to be careful and consistent.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
One of the advantages of being born a lovable Libra is that Valentine's Day always activates your Aquarius house of romance and recreation. Whether you're in the mood to take a risk this year depends on how Mercury retrograde in that zone is affecting you. Any cancelled flights, defective merchandise or missed messages yet? If you don't feel confident about pulling off a romantic getaway, arrange a luxurious celebration at your place where your Venus ruler, nestled in the arms of traditional Capricorn, can help you feel secure.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
Unlike your Libra neighbors, Scorpio's domestic situation at the moment is neither secure nor conducive to candlelit dinners at home. Mercury retrograde can disrupt the best-laid plans made via the mice on your desks and the men in your life. You'd be better off following loving Venus to a neighborhood venue where the goddess can work her charms without worrying something will go amiss. Know that on Valentine's Day itself, your passionate Mars coruler perfects a rewarding trine with the life-giving sun.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] How assertive will your partner become now that Mars is moving forward, albeit quite slowly, after 11 weeks retrograde? Especially when it comes to determining how your Valentine's Day celebration will play out. Mr. Macho is particularly powerful on that day, so if you harbor desires of your own, make them known far enough in advance to affect your companion's choices. Also make sure that between now and then, because Mercury is retrograde, nobody involved—e.g., the florist, the salesperson—mistakes what you want.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
The solar eclipse in your Aquarius house of assets and acquisitions could keep you focused almost exclusively on money matters. Therefore, despite having romantic Venus in your sign, Valentine's Day might not be that big a deal this year. Because you'll be especially inventive during the next two weeks, you'll find a way to express your love without spending big bucks. And since Mercury will still be retrograde, it shouldn't be difficult to come up with something from your past that will gladden your lover's heart.

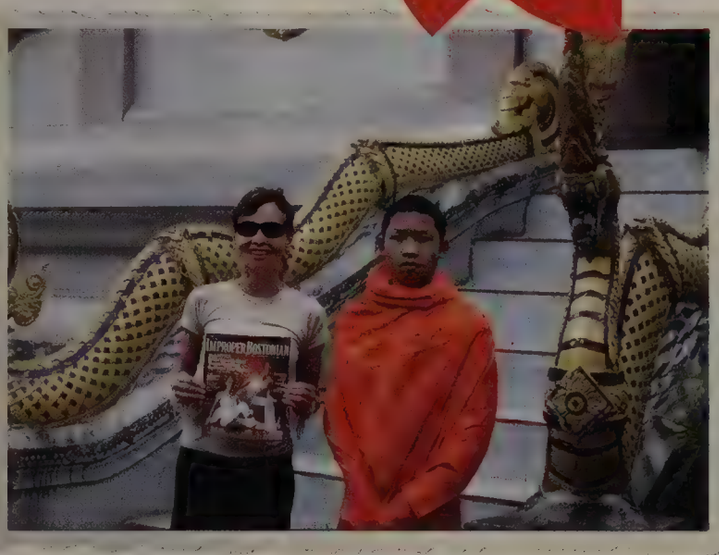
Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Sam and Terry Buss took this photo in front of Lambeau Field before the Packers destroyed the Seahawks on Jan. 12. They'd prefer if we didn't mention what happened at Lambeau on Jan. 20.



Catherine King posed for this shot (at a monastery school in Laos, Luang Prabang) with a monk named Cham. We were kind of hoping it would be a monk named Tony Shalhoub.

Nikolai Gorbunov brought the IMPROPER to Novosibirsk, Russia, and claims the building in the background is Saint Nikolai Church. Sure, Nikolai, and we suppose you're standing on Gorbunov Avenue.

LORDESS OF THE RINGS

Caron LeBrun and Nancy Keller at the Taj

A Rose by Any Other Name...

What a difference a year makes.

Or not.

In January '07, the chattering classes were nattering on about what a shame it was that yet another great Boston institution, the old Ritz-Carlton, had been sold off—to a foreign company, no less—and become the Taj. To the old guard, it was like Trinity Church had been turned into a Hare Krishna ashram or the BPL was being used as a whorehouse, and everyone was sure that the place would be ruined by new ownership who didn't understand Boston or respect its traditions.

Well, as the Taj's first-anniversary bash proved, change can be good. The Old Gray Lady of Arlington Street has never been swankier.

The party, held in the dining room overlooking the Public Garden, attracted the usual suspects from the free shrimp circuit, as well as such welcome faces as Myopia polo mistress Nancy Keller, catering cutie Walter Davis with the stunning Maria Webb, mistress of the Norfolk Hunt Mary Crane with the dashing Eric Morse and budding equestrienne Rebecca L'Hereux, and gardening guru Hilda Morrill with the ever-affable Ron, to name a few.

They oohed and aahed over the decor, which included chains of orchids hanging like curtains from the ceiling, white leather seating areas reminiscent of an Italian disco, enough candlelight to please Casanova and ice sculptures groaning under the weight of so many oysters, shrimp and crab claws that even the biggest schnorrer was guaranteed to leave feeling fat and happy.

As for the naysayers? They all seem to be converts. As one guest put it: "It took a while, but now I'm used to saying 'the Taj,' and no one looks at me like I'm talking about a tomb in India."

Pop Quiz!

The photo above shows the skating rink–sized ring of a prominent Boston socialite. Think you know who it is? Be the first to e-mail the correct answer to jonathan@improper.com and the magazine will make a $200 donation—in your name— to Dana-Farber.

Big Game...

F. Scott Fitzgerald was right. The rich are different than you and me. For one thing, they have more money. For another, they can afford a membership at Bosse Sports—the super-fancy fitness center in Sudbury—which hosted a South African–themed party to launch its new Soma Spa.

The gym, which boasts a membership consisting of gazillionaires like cable TV behemoth Amos Hostetter and NFL Napoloeon Bob Kraft, costs beaucoup dinero to join but boasts facilities fit for a king, including a virtual golf course where a computer will simulate 18 holes at faves like Pebble Beach and St. Andrews, while someone working on his short game can practice chipping from fall or summer grass, or out of traps emulating New England or Florida sand. While the sports facilities are for members only, the Soma Spa is open to the public, and its unveiling drew a ritzy crowd, primarily from the western suburbs.

Among them: owner DJ Bosse, Eagles drummer Scott Crago, fashion plate Rimma Gluzman (wife of Russian oil oligarch Vadim), Good Deeds babe Beth Miller, philanthropist Debbie Knez, real estate babe Amy Fisher, artist Kim Mai, Wayland socialite Dana Volman and one man who mentioned having gotten a $350 speeding ticket while driving a Bentley.

With South African wine, food, music and beauty products, just about the only thing missing were some lions and elephants and rhinos, but as one guest pointed out, passing on an hors d'oeuvre, "No thanks. I already feel like a hippo." ✖✖✖

Avez-vous dish? Dirt? A spectacular social occasion? Call JS at 617-859-1400, ext. 303, or send an e-mail to jonathan@improper.com.

KELLY
AUTOMOTIVE GROUP

The Kelly Automotive Group Offers Answers to the Frequently Pondered Questions of Car Buyers.

In a world when the internet offers an array of endless automotive data, there are still fundamental questions consumers struggle with every day. So, Brian Kelly, President of the Kelly Automotive Group has produced a series of videos that answer some of these questions, in a detailed, yet easy to understand manner, without a business agenda.

There are four such videos...

- Lease Or Buy
- Best Way To Finance
- How To Read A Car Ad
- How To Choose A Dealer

"I am asked these questions everywhere I go," Brian Kelly explains. "It's time the public has a professional and inside explanation. At first glance, it would be logical to assume these videos are elongated Kelly commercials, but refreshingly they are not."

All four videos are there for your immediate viewing, right now, at kellyauto.com

What Goes Around...

There's a special place in fashion hell for the designers who brought back skinny jeans. Last year's fad just passed me by. I stood my bootleg ground even when it felt out-of-date, believing skintight denim belongs to the emo crowd.

So I'm happy to report that spring brings tons of approachable styles for both sexes. That doesn't mean boring, though: Labels are showing innovations in print, color and detailing—paint-splashed fabrics, sherbet shades and beaded necklines, for example. "Go with what's you. We're past following every trend," Improper fashion editor Ruth Basloe explains.

The dress offers women the easiest way to update their wardrobes, with a choice of babydoll, shift or shirt silhouettes. That's perfect for the little girl in me, who shunned pants up through kindergarten. Call it a fashion cycle.

J'aime Couture

DESIGN OF THE TIMES

The world of fashion is a jungle, red in tooth, claw and high-heeled pumps. But Sidonie Pierce and Ciel Wendel, the designers behind the new Boston brand J'aime Colette, seem to be less motivated by cutthroat ambition than by something much more chummy.

"We've been friends since kindergarten," says Pierce, 28. "In the third grade we made clothes for our Barbies, and for Ken, too." Growing up together in Cambridge, Pierce and Wendell took their first foray into business by running a lemonade stand. As adults, they worked together for the now-defunct Liz Claiborne label Sigrid Olsen in Wakefield. They're currently launching their inaugural spring line in boutiques like Casa di Stile, History and Parlor.

"We want our clothes to be simple but unique," says Pierce. "We stay aware of trends, but we do what we like. Bright and pretty colors, high-quality fabrics. It doesn't have to be trendy."

Named after Wendell's sister, Jamie, and Pierce's daughter, Colette, J'aime Colette is stepping into a surprisingly fertile market. "Boston has gotten so many great new boutiques in the past three years," says Pierce. "It's a really up-and-coming spot."

ANDREW RIMAS

"Classic cocktails are back," Noir GM Kristi McNeil says.

Recipe
1½ oz. Makers
½ oz. Averna
Dollop of maple
Garnish with cinnamon stick

Drink of the Moment

Sin City

Like the black-and-white mystery flicks projected against the blinds, the "film noir" cocktails are Noir's homage to underappreciated classics. Although none of the staff appears to have seen the movies, and the theme has the subtlety of a blackjack to the skull, it gets you in the door.

The Dark City ($12) is named after the '98 cult hit, which is basically The Matrix with less overt religious cues. A mix of Makers Mark, Averna and a dab of maple—garnished with a cinnamon stick—it's a drink "for people who aren't used to bourbon," bartender Mika Miller says. "I suggest it when people order Manhattans."

A cocktail worthy of a long stakeout, the Dark City needs time to mellow. "It's definitely a sipper," Miller adds. Eventually, the maple and cinnamon pool, leaving a welcome payoff at the end.

It's a seasonal favorite with regulars who appreciate the bar's aesthetic. "We started coming here because it was dark, comfortable and respectable," says a Harvard Square worker just off shift with a colleague. "We were drinking the Noir's Boudoir, slugging them down because they taste like candy, so we switched to these." Seated before two half-empty glasses, she admits, "Over time we acclimated; now we're slugging these down."

Bogart would punch you for ordering one, but paired with something salty, like grilled flat bread with asiago and prosciutto ($10), it's a sweet accompaniment and a sufficient beginning to a night spent looking for real trouble.

Good Eats

LEAVE THE GUN, TAKE THE SANDWICH

No pancakes in sight at this homey South Boston boîte named for the famous track off Frank Zappa's Apostrophe. No breakfast items at all. Still, locals crowd the 18 seats at St. Alphonzo's Kitchen (formerly Potbellies) for Peter and Natasha Irving's simple fare. We love the hearty sandwiches at slim prices: None tops $8, and that includes a choice of sides, like macaroni salad, crunchy cukes and marinated mushrooms. They consume more than half of the chalkboard menu, but ask for advice and Peter is quick to extol the virtues of the Godfather: a toasted sub roll crammed with sweet-salty salume (capicola and mortadella), provolone and lettuce, and lightly dressed with olive oil and balsamic vinegar.

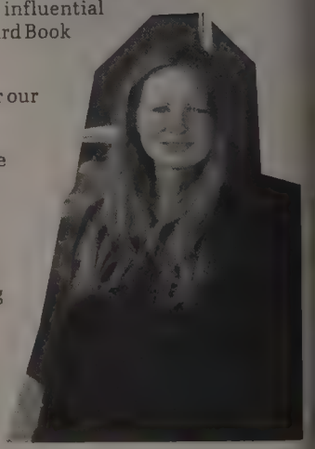
Question for Samantha Hunt

What were Nikola Tesla's three greatest contributions to society?

National Book Foundation Award winner Samantha Hunt is the author of The Invention of Everything Else, a novel based on the life of Nikola Tesla—one of history's least known yet most influential inventors. She discusses the work Feb. 21 at the Harvard Book Store.



1. AC/electricity: His discoveries here are the basis for our entire modern electric system.

2. Radio: He actually invented radio three years before Guglielmo Marconi, the man widely credited with its invention. In fact, eight years before Marconi sent his signal across the ocean, Tesla published an article explaining the wireless transmission of information.

3. The wireless transmission of energy: This one is big because we've yet to figure out what to do with it. Through this process, we could in reality someday live in a world where energy is free for everyone. But it's hard to get any energy company to support a cause that might eventually put them out of business.

Champagne Wishes

Flashbulbs, limos and bejeweled bosoms—even if you're watching the red carpet from the vantage of your sofa, the Academy Awards are the perfect excuse for a splash of glamour. And nothing's more glamorous than a splash of genuine champagne. The following highly recommended Brut NVs showed best in my recent blind tastings.

GOSSET
"Excellence" Champagne, Brut NV, $43.99 at Brix
On the fleshier side, with creamy textures and subtle, apple-like fruit, this outstanding producer's flagship bottling shows the full "biscuity," yeasty aromas of a wine that has aged for at least three to four years. There's a sensation of grilled nuts on the palate. It has the body and staying power to complement roast duck.

BOLLINGER
"Special Cuvee" Champagne, Brut NV, $49.99 at Bauer Wine
Bollinger enjoys a devoted following among connoisseurs who like pinot-dominant bubbly. This is a bit bolder than most other NVs on the market. It's deeper in color, with complex red fruit, honey and a tart spiciness on the finish. Definitely not a champagne to fade into the background. Enjoy this assertively structured beauty with salmon.

DUVAL-LEROY
"Fleur" Champagne, Brut NV, $29.99 at the Wine Cask
This family-owned house makes champagne more in an understated style, with an appealing blend of lemon and nutlike scents. Delicate and fresh with a touch of sweet herb, but quite mellow, this stylish drink would go nicely with delicate white fish. It's also a great romantic stand-alone starter.

HENRIOT
Champagne, Brut NV, $39.99 at Martignetti Liquors
In my opinion this venerable producer's reputation is well deserved, although I was the only one on my tasting panel of 12 who rated it this highly. From the tangerine, grilled pear aromas to the lean, toasty but crisp fruit flavors, it struck me as beautifully balanced. I love the suggestion of vanilla. A sensuous, romantic Champagne I would enjoy with lightly spicy fish or chicken.

Going Out

NIGHTLIFE MYTHOLOGY

Barred from the gates of new fashion/food spot the Achilles Project (friends and family only), I'm forced to rely on cofounder Michael Krupp's storytelling until the Feb. 18 opening. "We created this hanging glass wall system, which during the day forms a maze of products, and in the evening fold[s] and lock[s] together. This allows us to push them aside and have more of a lounge," Krupp explains. "This was a serious structural mission. Even the tables are on rails."

Imagining a 9,100-square-foot network of near–half-ton interlocking glass cubes, I can't help but picture the Minotaur roaming the halls of silk and denim. But taking creative liberties seems to be encouraged in a venue where flat screens change from sports to art, and couture hangs alongside playable Wiis. "The whole concept is an exploration," Krupp says.

In the rear of the space is Persephone, headed by Lumière's Michael Leviton. Sure to be hip, it's green—"all our food is organic, sustainable when possible, and we have a full composting system"—and serves, get this, small plates. But, in keeping with the theme of malleability, diners can design their own experience. There are also medium, large and extra-large plates, like grilled-whole Maryland black bass ($44). The bar offers its own diverse options, from oysters ($2.25) to red-curry chicken wings ($9), and bacon and sea salt pretzels ($8). Never tried one, but I know what meat, salt and bread taste like, and can guess it's pretty good.

The drink menu, designed by Lumière's Chris Graeff, also spans a wide spectrum. There's the fratty Achilles' Heel ($12, limit two per customer), an incapacitating mix of vodka, tequila, gin, rum, pomegranate liquor, sour mix and Coke; the confident Desperate Housewife ($12), a blend of nigori sake, vodka, blueberry syrup, cranberry juice, ginger and lemon; and the self-conscious "Obligatory $15 Chowhound-predicted Pomegranate Martini" ($9). Easy, Chris; passive aggression is right in the blogosphere's wheelhouse.

Beauty

Bootiful Elephant Syndrome is no laughing matter. Butt augmentations increased 158 percent from 2000 to 2004, according to the American Society of Plastic Surgeons. Inspired by such high demand, Jenny from the Block and countless hip-hop lyrics, Susan Bloomstone of Newton and Lisa Reisler of Montreal decided to create Booty Pop panties. The undergarments, made of 95 percent cotton and 5 percent spandex, come in seven bootylicious "flavors" (including Pink Cotton Candy and Blueberry Gumdrop). The undies give the illusion of a well-shaped derriere. "It's not about looking bigger. It's the better proportion that's great," Bloomstone explains. In her ideal world, women everywhere would stand in front of mirrors and ask: "Do these pants make me look flat?"

"I decided to watch a few shows to see what the hype was about, but I wasn't hooked," Hui says. "Then, we decided to compete among us to see who could best pick who was kicked off each show. All of a sudden, I went from a passive, almost reluctant viewer to an engaged fan." The competition of betting, says Hui, was what made these shows worth watching.

A few months later, Hui and Hanover moved the battle online, creating TVLeagues.com, a Web site where fans can join teams, make wagers and predict who the next loser will be on popular shows like American Idol and Project Runway. "We look forward to including many more shows in the near future," Hui assures us. Hello, Flavor of Love!

BEFORE THE FALL

DEAR AWESOME guy at Gillette Stadium: I had two great tickets to the Redskins game on Oct. 28. I was so excited to see the Pats play live on a beautiful fall afternoon. After a brisk walk to the stadium we arrived at the main gate. I proudly reached for my ticket in my pocket, only to find it empty! I couldn't find my ticket anywhere! I had put it into the back left pocket of my jeans so I could access it easily at the gate. I don't know what happened, but my ticket was gone! A gentleman in a Patriots jacket came up to me as I was groping all possible pockets for a ticket to hide in, and he handed me a ticket. All he said was, "You need a ticket? Here." He walked off into the stadium and disappeared into the crowd. He didn't even hang around long enough for me to thank him properly. All that I could manage was an anonymous, "Thank you!" yelled into the backs of dozens of football spectators. So here's to you, guy with the extra ticket. From one Pats fan to another, thank you so much! I will never forget your generosity.

Melanie U

To the guy who spilled coffee all over me at the beginning of class and didn't apologize:

I realize that you think you are super hip because you talk like Spicoli from Fast Times at Ridgemont High, wear skin-tight black jeans and look like you rubbed a balloon on your head before walking into class. That, however, does not excuse the fact that you spilled my two-thirds-full, grande, sugar-free hazelnut Starbucks coffee all over my brand new cardigan and North Face jacket with your patch-emblazoned messenger bag and didn't even acknowledge the fact that you had just single-handedly ruined my afternoon. Thanks to you I had to walk across campus with a giant tan stain on my lap. A little "Whoops" or "My bad" would have significantly ameliorated the situation, but I guess it would have been too "uncool" to apologize. I hope you bring a huge hot coffee to class next week. Karma sure can be a bitch.

Research shows that in many clinical cases, depression and other negative emotions can be caused by distortions in thinking. Let's call them thinking fumbles. Three common thinking fumbles seemed to have happened to many fans:

The Parade Before the Victory Fumble. Many fans started celebrating too early. It's the same phenomenon that happened to throngs of Yankees fans in 2004, but apparently many Boston fans forgot what happened. This fumble can be corrected by refocusing on the next game. There will be another Pats season. Stay focused on the possibilities the future holds.

The Tom Brady's My Best Friend Fumble. It's easy to over-identify with people who are successful. Many fans are quite willing to experience success vicariously as their favorite team grabs the trophy, and for some, this is the most excitement they experience in life. When your team doesn't do so well, your ego takes a painful hit too.

The Spygate Conspiracy Fumble. As we grieve any type of loss, we go through psychological stages including one called bargaining. Bargaining is when we try to make sense out of something we aren't willing to accept. Some fans have been speculating that some higher power or fate has righted the wrong of Spygate by throwing a flag on the Patriots' perfect season. Move on from the "what ifs" of the 2008 postseason and remember that God has other things to do besides even the score against you.

Get a better grip on your thinking, quit fumbling your thoughts and get back on track.

AIN'T LIFE GRAND?

A love story and a new Somerville shop

The Good Wife

THE LONG MARRIAGE of charming, sexy, charismatic senator Tom Naughton and his gracious, patiently loving wife, Delia, produces great curiosity in Nathan and Meri, who live in the adjoining townhouse. Tom's infidelities, including a truly unforgivable affair with daughter Nancy's friend, Carolee, have caused them to separate in Sue Miller's latest novel. But the long humming affection between them persists, with decades of ongoing connection, togetherness and even lovemaking. There is mutual respect. Tom, not fully a cad, and Delia, not exactly martyred, happen to remain deeply attached. But their kids, stiff-necked Nancy especially, are against the tie and want it snipped. Meri develops a close bond with maternal Delia. When she becomes a grouchy, dissatisfied mother herself, suffering a postpartum sexual standoff with Nathan, Delia pours her graceful encouragement over the young woman. Suddenly, Tom, impaired by a stroke and needing full-time care, is brought back home. Miller's storytelling is warm, almost Delia-like. She also masters the narrative squeaking of brakes, with shocking left turns that bring transformations freighted with paradoxical meanings.

Sue Miller's The Senator's Wife tells the tale of two marriages.

Union Flair

GRAND HAS A SLEEK PURITY that brings a welcome jolt to Somerville's Union Square. The contemporary store's aesthetic combines the spare with the witty. Understated shoes, including martial arts sneakers by Feiyue, invite a chic, unfettered stroll. Some have an amusing collar-like feature in tweed; others lace all the way up. A pair of cheery, red plaid flats could become your shoe wardrobe's main squeeze. And consider the political fun of wearing a sweatshirt with Lincoln and Kennedy bracketing the zipper. Nobly solitudinous tree branches appear on sofa pillows and T's. The shirt on an infant's tiny chest is a great gallery on which to display a watercolor-style penguin or little bulldog. The overall feel—in home furnishings, clothes and art—is clean, charming, occasionally dead-pan/ironic. One table seems to have a waving cloth on it, only the "cloth" is made of flowing plastic. Another wooden table is made from raw, twisted trunks and roots.

Whey Cool James Lionette suggests wasting no time getting over to his South End market for the precious pouches heaped in his cheese case. The wax-paper-wrapped purses, which come from the other side of the Charles (Somerville, to be exact), cloak what many mozzarella fans consider the crème de la crème—literally. Break into a bulb of Fiore di Nonno's burrata, which is handcrafted and delivered fresh on Tuesday and Friday afternoons, and you'll find a creamy gush of tangy mascarpone in one of four flavors: plain, fig, a sweet-and-savory roasted garlic and onion, and a particularly delicious version infused with the Middle Eastern spice blend, za'atar. You'll quickly understand how cheese becomes trendy. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Steaking a new claim

NO BURGERS, NO BAR MENU, no bargains. Is this any way to run a steakhouse in a building that formerly housed a West Roxbury fried chicken palace? It is, if you're Jeffrey Fournier. Since Fournier, also chef/owner of 51 Lincoln in Newton, bought into Vintage just a few months ago, he's overhauled the menu, paid "constant attention" to quality and begun to attract a most desirable clientele, including Terry Francona and former Patriots player Andre Tippett.

Sports figures like "big red wines and steak," says Fournier, adding that he "hates" the word "steakhouse" because it's "overplayed." Nonetheless, the menu features a "Butchers Block" section of à la carte meats paired with sauces—veal demiglace, Gorgonzola fondue—at prices ranging from $26 for pork chops to $42 for a beef porterhouse. Given the escalating cost of feed and transportation, Fournier says, that pricey porterhouse—the best he can buy—is barely profitable.

Co-owner Jeffrey Fournier

But it's not all about profit. And it's "not the start of a steakhouse empire," he says. "One restaurant at a time." Details matter: Instead of clichéd creamed spinach, Vintage offers spinach flash-sautéed with garlic and lemon. "I learned that from Lydia," says Fournier, back when he was Shire's executive sous chef at Excelsior. In place of traditional fine-dining white cloths, tables are set with vinyl place mats. "It makes people relax a little more," he explains, pointing out that cloth is "bad for the environment. Think of the water, the chemicals needed to clean it all!"

Thinking of dessert? No crème brûlée here, thank goodness. House-made desserts include a creamy cheesecake laced with hazelnuts and a rich German chocolate tartlet oozing warm caramel and topped with cool coconut crème anglaise.

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH MARC ORFALY }

PUB GRUB

JJ Foley's Cafe serves heart-warming comfort fare.

"To be honest with you, it's a place I go to drink. I haven't done a whole lot of eating there," Marc Orfaly admitted when I asked him to join me at JJ Foley's Cafe in the South End. It was just the kind of answer I wanted. Since Orfaly focuses on high-end French cuisine at his restaurant Pigalle and homey Italian at Marco, I decided to take him to the 99-year-old pub that recently got a face-lift and now serves the kind of simple, meat-and-potatoes fare his eateries never would—a true escape.

In fact, Orfaly does visit Foley's frequently; he and his wife, Kerri Foley (no relation), live nearby, so it's an easy pit stop after a long stint behind the line. "Fridays and Saturday nights, it's just bananas in here," Marc told me. Kerri, who had planned to join us for our pub lunch, was home with the couple's sick daughter, so it was just the two of us inside an almost empty dining room one recent Saturday afternoon.

Though we visited during one of the slowest times of the week (they stopped serving Saturday brunch because it didn't do enough business), we could still sense a familial vibe coursing through the new addition to this long-standing haunt. The room is rimmed with wooden banquettes, while a few high-top tables sit in the center. Patrick Foley, son of owner Jerry, was eager to please and came to the table with a big smile and his pen at the ready.

Marc took the casual vibe seriously, arriving in chef's pants and a ski hat, and he immediately hopped into gear with a pint of Harpoon IPA ($4) while I went with a Long Trail Ale ($4). There are about a dozen beers on tap, mostly domestic and Irish pub standards (Smithwicks, Harpoon IPA, Pabst Blue Ribbon), as well as a respectable wine list (nothing costs more than $30 per bottle).

We embraced our urge to feast on the most fattening fare (after all, Marc doesn't get it that often) and started with the appetizer combo ($12). No different than what you'd find at any other bar in town, it covered the basics: mozzarella sticks, Buffalo wings (which we both devoured for their tender, tangy and not overly messy traits), quesadillas and potato skins, plus five dipping sauces. We also tried the stuffed clams ($6), two mammoth shells filled with diced quahogs, a spicy kick of chorizo and roasted corn all sizzled under the broiler. "Usually when you go to pub-type establishments and order this, it's a big bread ball. These are just right," Marc said. I agreed. Being able to taste the clam and chorizo was a bonus.

FAT SPREE Marc Orfaly feasts on appetizers like wings and potato skins.

GET STUFFED Clams filled with chorizo and corn

Patrick came by with a few recommendations for the rest of our meal, including the turkey bacon wrap ($7), filled with roasted turkey, strips of salty bacon, red onions, lettuce and tomato. Chipotle mayo oozed out the back but luckily landed right on top of (and became the dipping sauce for) a pile of hand-cut fries. After our "mid-course," we tried the Foley burger ($12), which made Marc pause momentarily in awe. "I don't know, a full pound of beef? I hope it's enough," he dead-panned before mashing the two massive patties down inside the cushiony bun and cutting it in half for us to share. While it was far from the pinkish medium-rare we asked for, the overdone burger was still full of beefy flavor.

Jerry's homemade shepherd's pie

Next came Jerry's homemade shepherd's pie ($14), served in an oval ramekin filled with chunks of lamb, peas and carrots, and covered with a layer of fluffed-up mashed potatoes. "I like how the pie is offset by the salad," said Marc, observing the heaping mass of mixed greens generously dressed in a sweet vinaigrette. "If I just had that as a meal, I'd be all set."

With hardly an ounce of space left, we had to forgo dessert , choosing instead to finish off the beers and give our bellies a rest. "It's definitely a great neighborhood spot," Marc said as we rolled ourselves out the door. "Not to mention, it's the only place around here where you can get this kind of food." ***

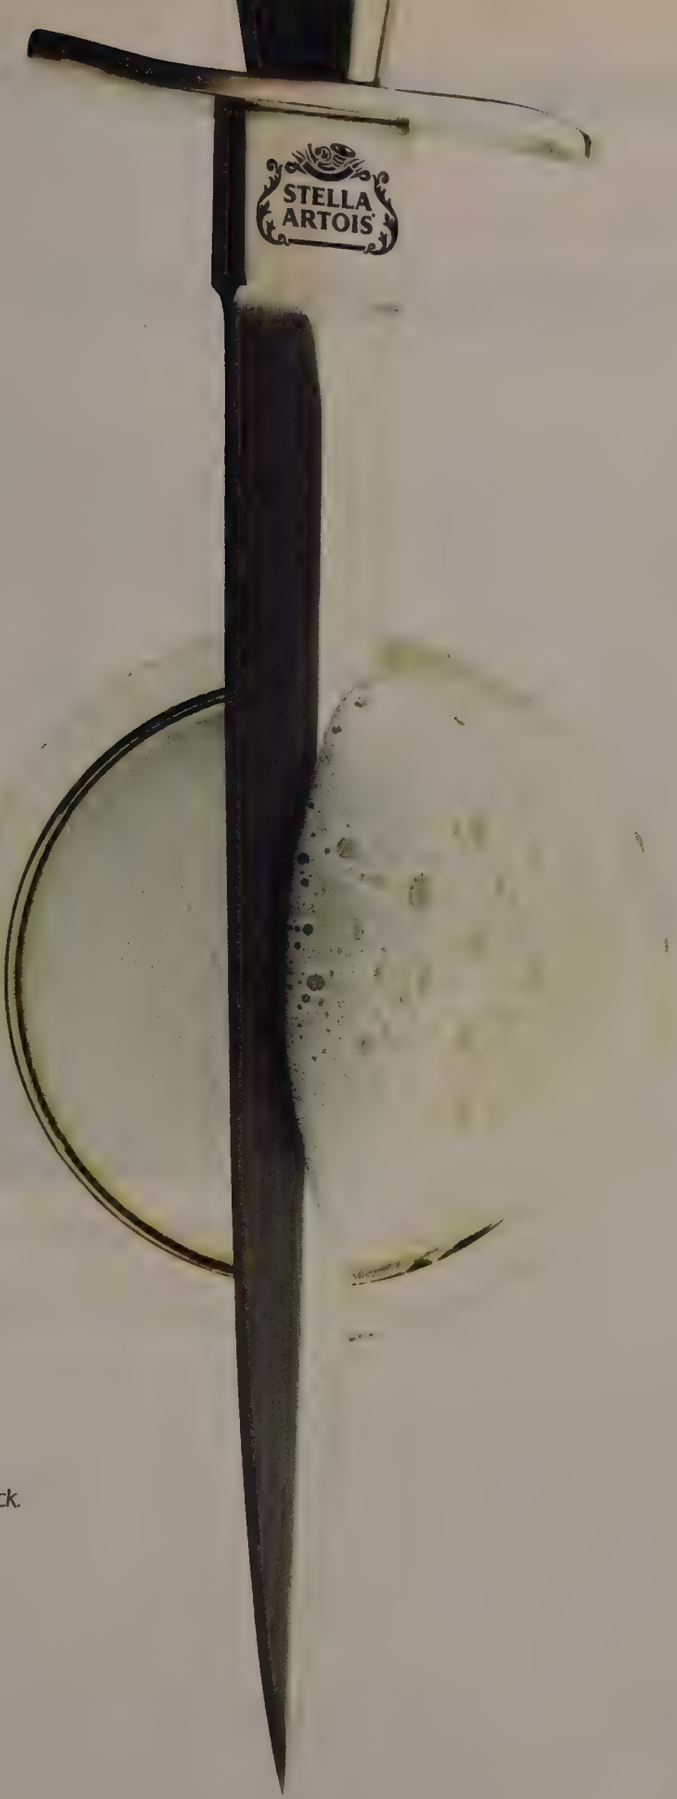
STELLA ARTOIS

erfection HAS ITS PLACE

fectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.



Step One THE PURIFICATION
The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE
The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY
The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD
The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL
The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING
While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT
The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING
The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL
A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

To experience the Nine-Step Belgian Pouring Ritual and the perfectly poured Stella Artois, please visit one of these Gold Standard Establishments:

CULTURE SHOCK

To get out of your comfort zone, try an electrified bathtub. Naked. In public. In Japan.

SO I'M IN JAPAN TO DO A STORY, the premise of which is to drive around the main island and generally try to get lost and confused in a way that's just not possible in Tokyo. Along for the ride are my buddy Murph and my photographer-friend Brian. On the third day, we meet up with my high-school chum Jason, who lives in rural Japan and works for the Air Force. After a day of white-knuckle driving through the perpetual snow of northern Honshu, I inform Jason that I'm keen to visit some hot springs (called "onsens"), which are all over Japan. I even remembered to bring my bathing suit. "Oh," he replies. "You won't be needing that." And thus begins an experience that, had it been featured in Lost in Translation, would've enlivened that movie considerably.

Jason doesn't give us much of a preview of onsen etiquette, so I'm not quite sure how to behave after we all strip down and march into the vast room that houses the various springs. One thing I can be pretty sure of is that laughing is discouraged, based on the fact that I'm the only one doing it. My giggles are partly my natural reaction to horrible social awkwardness—which really doesn't get much more profound than when you're hanging out naked with a high-school friend, a Boston friend, a coworker and 20 or so Japanese dudes—and partly good old-fashioned slapstick comedy. You see, Murph is about 5'7" and 250 pounds; Brian is six feet and 165. Seeing their naked butts next to one another in the shower is the kind of basic sight gag that makes it difficult to maintain one's comportment.

Luckily, I have other distractions—like figuring out how, exactly, to shower. For some inexplicable reason, the locals prefer to shower sitting down, and that presents more challenges and social bumbling as I gingerly lower my bare bottom onto the kind of small plastic stool that a five-year-old might use to reach the bathroom sink. The idea of having my butt on a public stool is too much to handle, so while scrubbing, I alternate between the stool and an awkward stooping crouch. Between my nakedness and bad posture, I either look like Gollum from Lord of the Rings or a malfunctioning Terminator freshly arrived from the future. Either way, I have no choice, because the only thing worse than nude shower-crouching is standing while everyone else is sitting.

Relaxation includes dipping your testicles in electrified water.

Eventually we're done cleaning, and Jason describes the attributes of the various pools before us. "That one's the main tub, that one's got sulfur in it, that one's electrified, there's one outdoors…" Hold on. "Did you just say 'electrified'?" I ask. "Yeah," he replies. "One of them shoots electric current into the water." I guess you learn something new every day, because I wouldn't have guessed that anybody's concept of relaxation includes dipping his testicles in electrified water, but there you have it.

We follow Jason's lead into the main pool, which has built-in seats and looks pretty much like a giant hot tub. After barely a minute, Jason develops onsen ADD and heads over to the sulfur spring, followed by the electric tub. Emboldened by my successful foray into the bubbling waters of the novice pool, I jump over to the zapper.

The pool is rectangular and about 10 feet long. It's a bit like a giant bathtub, except that where you would normally find water jets along the sides, there are instead modules that shoot a steady stream of current into the water. Jason warns me that the middle of the tub, with the outlets on each side, is where the electricity is strongest. I gingerly stretch my arm into the danger zone, and immediately my muscles begin convulsing involuntarily. This seems all wrong on a variety of levels, yet after I pull my arm out of harm's way, it feels strangely pleasant—like someone just gave it a thorough massage. Misguidedly encouraged, I duck-walk into the center of the water, between the electrodes, in an attempt to loosen up my sore back. Bad idea. As soon as I step into the middle of the tub, the current hits me full force, and, far from a soothing experience, it feels like I've flopped onto an electric fence. I don't handle the situation gracefully. My eyes bug out of my head as I emit a startled yip and claw the air, squirming back toward the edge and generally doing a passable pantomime of the "Don't tase me, bro!" guy. Jason expresses his sympathy by laughing at me from the opposite end of the tub. "Now I know what it would look like if you were electrocuted while taking a dump," he says.

Indeed. The funny thing is, this is probably the second time in two days that I've looked like that. Yes, my dip in the voltage happened the day after the Super Bowl. You cope in your way, I'll cope in mine. ✖✖✖

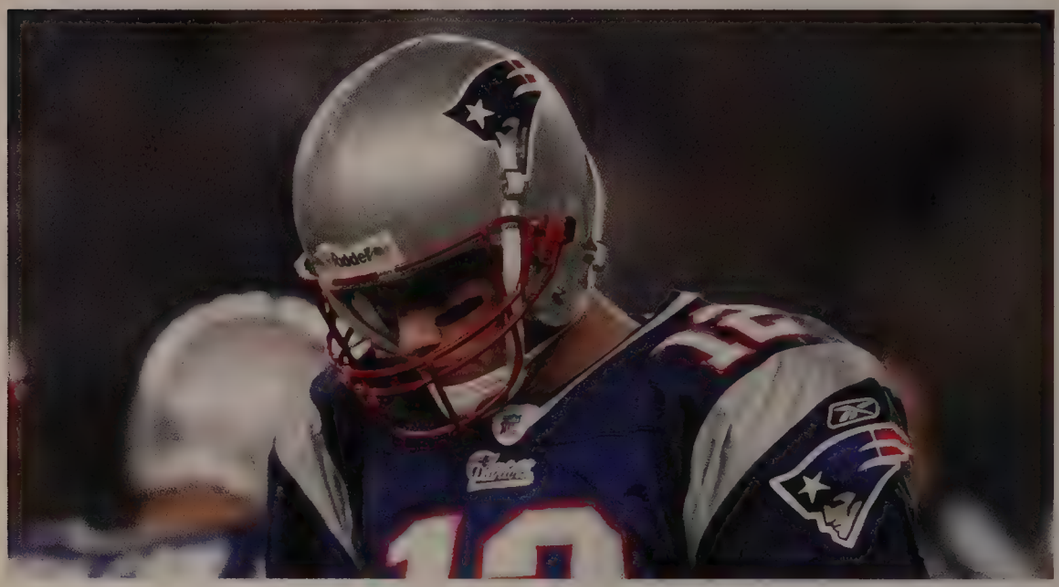
The Collins Card { CHRIS COLLINS }

MY SUPER BOWL DIARY

I left to witness history. If I'd only known which kind.



SUNDAY: I leave Logan Airport on a 9:30 am flight to beat the team to Phoenix. I want to see the Patriots land and especially to watch Tom Brady walk down the stairway.

When the Patriots' jet arrives, my eyes—and those of all the other reporters—go straight to Brady. There is no noticeable limp, and there is definitely no boot. Day 1 is a success, I conclude. We got Brady walking.

One of the first questions he receives at the first of many press conferences is about his girlfriend, supermodel Gisele Bundchen. He's annoyed. I would be, too.

MONDAY: Brady practices for the first time—we think—since the AFC Championship. His ankle is heavily taped, and he has a slight limp. I wonder if maybe Bootgate was overblown. Brady's teammates are thrilled to have their leader practicing again, regardless. Wes Welker tells me, "He looked like he always looks, like Tommy. He's the best in the game."

Still, two guys confide: "He's not really ready yet, but there's still time." Later, the Giants arrive, wearing all black. "What's that about?" I wonder, and my unease over Brady's ankle builds.

TUESDAY: The freak show known as NFL Media Day is stranger than ever. I get word from a league flack that a record number of credentials have been issued for Super Bowl XLII—4,786 to be exact. It seems 2,000 of these "reporters" wouldn't know Tom Brady from Greg Brady. The QB's ankle becomes a side story, as his rock star status seems more interesting to these people.

The biggest football news is that Giants wide receiver Plaxico Burress makes like Joe Namath and guarantees victory, predicting a shocking upset, 23-17, which would go down as one of the biggest of all time. What an idiot, I think. People have tried similar ploys against the Patriots and paid for it dearly.

WEDNESDAY: This is the day the injury report comes in, and not surprisingly Tom Brady is on it, like he is every week, with a right shoulder injury. There is no mention of the ankle.

The only other news is Brady reacting to Burress' prediction. He laughs before saying, "He only predicted 17 points? Why couldn't he have said 42?"

THURSDAY: Things begin heating up as fans roll into town. Burress remains big news, but Rodney Harrison isn't swayed: "You put a lot of pressure on yourself when you make comments like that. For us, we just shut up and perform. He'll have an opportunity to prove it on Sunday. We'll see what happens."

The Patriots are loose, but Brady knows what's at stake. "It's the biggest game of our lives," he says. "We're going to be remembering this game for as long as we live, win or lose."

The crazy thing is, despite having just three guys who have been in a Super Bowl, the Giants are just as relaxed, just as cool and just as comfortable. On the vaunted G-men pass rush,

These reporters wouldn't know Tom Brady from Greg Brady.

Brady acknowledges, "Our interests are not mutually aligned. They get paid the more they hit me. I've got to get rid of it quick."

This is also the day Sen. Arlen Specter rears his head. Months after the fact, he demands to know why the evidence in Spygate has been destroyed. I don't like where this is headed.

FRIDAY: The players are done talking. Only the coaches, with the Lombardi Trophy in front of the podium, speak to the media.

Forced to address Spygate, Belichick calls it a "league matter," and commissioner Roger Goodell says he's satisfied with his penalties and the destruction of film.

SATURDAY: I'm sick to my stomach, and it has nothing to do with the food I ate or the beers I drank the night before. I'm sick because John Tomase from Boston Herald reports that a source told him the Patriots taped a Rams walkthrough the day before Super Bowl XXXVI. The Patriots issue a hasty statement denying the allegations. All of the national TV outlets treat the news as truth, which it might be. Ex-49er Steve Young blasts the Patriots. Tomase, a fine Patriots beat writer, receives death threats. Man, this is nasty.

SUNDAY: I arrive at beautiful University of Phoenix Stadium about four hours early. I'm pumped again and trying to forget most of Saturday, but I get bad vibes when I see Belichick sporting a bright red sweatshirt. What the hell is he thinking? And it only gets worse. The Giants beat the crap out of the Patriots, although the Pats maintain a lead. I can't believe they're going to win another game playing ugly football. I'm wrong. Late in the fourth, Eli Manning finds David Tyree, and then Burress grabs the lead with just 35 seconds left. Stunned doesn't begin to explain it. I'm in a funk, but I have to be a professional and do my job with NECN. I finish my interviews and head back to New England. When do pitchers and catchers report? ✖✖✖

ON CELTICS, ANGRY LETTERS, MUSTACHES AND BIG SCHIL

3 Best Reader Responses to Last Issue's Super Bowl Predictions

1] Nice predictions. But what could I expect from a guy who writes for Boston's junior varsity version of Us Weekly? The arrogance displayed by you and the rest of Patriots nation was nauseating, and in the wake of Big Blue's win, it appears quite comical.

Best,
Mark

P.S. Are estrogen shots a bona fide occupational requirement for working at the Improper*?*

2] If you don't have a Giants helmet readily available, I will lend you one of my Giants caps for your unclad dash through Copley Square.

Joe

P.S. I also have a Giants blanket that I will allow you to wear right before it's time for your sprint under a Big Blue sky.

3] Hahaha wooo… just seeing your five predictions now. Good stuff. Gold, really. This is why everyone hates the Patriots. All their fans are newbies circa 2001, yet they all make these absurdly arrogant predictions. I'd say, "That's the sort of comedy you couldn't even write," but hey, you already have.

Sincerely,
Bob

5 STAR CELTICS MIDSEASON REPORT

The Celtics experience finally feels complete. Minus one star for Tommy Heinsohn's HD nose hairs.

For chemistry: The biggest question heading into the season has become the team's biggest strength halfway through. It starts with Kevin Garnett, but as we've seen the last few weeks, it doesn't end there. For the first few months KG was like a dad holding the back of the Celtics' bicycle while his teammates learned to ride. The "Holy crap, I can do this myself!" moment hit the C's sometime around the Dallas game, and they haven't looked back. But with that being said: KG, how 'bout you come back now?

For the bench: Ray Allen and Garnett have missed a combined 13 games this year, during which the Celtics have gone 10-3. A lot of this speaks to the consistency and leadership of Paul Pierce, but crazy credit goes to Tony Allen, Glen Davis, Leon Powe and, of course, James Posey, who've stepped up more times than we can mention. And then there's Scal. Yeah… hmm… now this is a little awkward.

For Comcast HD: It took Comcast three months to get this going, but it was worth the wait. Away-game HD coverage went off without a hitch and the Celtics experience finally feels complete. Minus one star for Tommy Heinsohn's HD nose hairs.

For adjustments: Even though the C's only have nine losses, it's mildly disturbing that there are three teams that beat them twice and a fourth (Charlotte) that really should have. In each case, the Celtics are the more talented team, but haven't been able to get over the hump—although they did beat Orlando once. We'll see how this pans out Feb. 27–March 5, when Boston plays three of four against Cleveland, Charlotte and Detroit.

For Scot Pollard's facial hair: Seriously, Scot. The freshly shaven, ponytail look isn't cutting it. We're not asking for much. Maybe a simple handlebar mustache, or some thick mutton chops smoothly faded into a faux hawk? Thanks in advance.

4 DATES TO WATCH

2/20 All position players (yes, Manny, you're a position player) must report today, and spring training officially gets underway. Prepare yourself for at least two weeks of nonstop coverage of hot items, including how many times Tim Wakefield plays golf and how well Craig Hansen's sleeping since his apnea surgery.

2/22 Rajon Rondo turns 22 years old as the C's take on the Suns in Phoenix. It's easy to get caught up in Rondo's potential and forget that the guy is a full 12 years younger than Steve Nash, or even weirder, the same age as the Olsen twins.

2/27 The Celtics host LeBron and the Cavs. The C's have proven they can win the big game this year, but still haven't shown they can beat King James, something they might want to take care of before the playoffs start.

2/28 The Sox take the field for the first time in 2008 with split-squad scrimmages against Boston College and Northeastern. And so ends Terry Francona's yearly attempt to quit chewing tobacco.

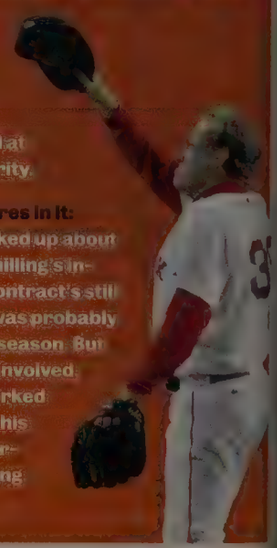
2 OLD PITCHERS GONE WILD

"No, you have it all wrong. Piazza threw the bat at me!": If Roger Clemens is actually innocent in this steroids mess, it will be a serious shocker. But if he is lying, and we all assume he is, you've got to applaud how ridiculously stubborn and delusionary he's acting. Congress could have a photo of him in the locker room with 15 needles—all labeled "Super Steroids"—in his ass, and Roger would still act enraged at the attack on his integrity.

Just Throw Some Sutures in It: It's hard to get too worked up about the severity of Curt Schilling's injury and whether his contract's still valid when at best, he was probably the fourth starter this season. But when Curt in the Car's involved, we can't help but be worked up. Regardless of how this thing turns out, it's guaranteed to be entertaining.



ONE LAST WORD ON THE SUPER BOWL

OR "ONE WORD ON THE SUPER BOWL THAT I DON'T WANT TO WRITE BECAUSE THE MERE THOUGHT OF THE GAME STILL GIVES ME INSTANT DIARRHEA, BUT I FEEL LIKE IT'S MY DUTY."

When I went down to New Orleans for Super Bowl XXXVI, I did so with zero expectations. I was just hoping the Patriots won, or more realistically, kept things close. And when Vinatieri's kick went through, I lost it. My eyes immediately teared up, I hugged a bunch of random people and nearly removed my Dad's arm with a high five. It was far and away the greatest feeling I've ever had as a sports fan.

Six years later, to the day, I was sitting in University of Phoenix Stadium and from almost the same vantage point watched Randy Moss make a dramatic go-ahead touchdown in the waning moments of Super Bowl XLII. But this time I didn't cry or hug any random dudes or dislocate my Dad's shoulder. Instead, I gave one solid MJ fist pump and sat down relieved. It wasn't "Oh my God, the Pats are going to win another Super Bowl!" It was "OK, that was a close call. I can't believe they almost blew this game." Of course, those feelings meant nothing. The Giants made every play they needed to during the final two and a half minutes, and the Patriots made none.

Over the past couple weeks—between not reading the newspaper, never signing onto ESPN.com and avoiding SportsCenter like it was a yellow Mike and Ike—I've had a lot of time to think about the game, and why I felt the way I did. It comes down to this:

At some point during the season, losses became more important than wins. That's to say, as the Pats played those close games against Baltimore, Philadelphia and the Giants (the first time), we weren't worried about winning (it's not like we could have moved into super first place); we were more focused on not losing—the game, the undefeated season, the history. In the moment, that was an amazing feeling, one that won't ever be recreated, but in reality, it's kind of messed up. We had set a bar and were living in a world where a Super Bowl victory—the greatest moment any fan can experience—was expected. It was hard to really appreciate all the winning and the record and the dominance for what it was, because it started to feel normal. It was just what the Patriots were supposed to do. That doesn't seem right, and if anything good came from that loss (and I'm still not convinced anything did or will), it's that I don't think I'll ever take the Patriots or winning, in general, for granted.

Would I rather still be that arrogant prick whose team doesn't lose instead of some loser with perspective? Probably, but this is what we've got now. And the next time the Pats have a chance to win the Super Bowl, I'm hoping that I'll be able enjoy it a little more.

"You have to have the arrogance to open people up and enough fear to know that anything can go wrong."

Soroff On ATUL GAWANDE

The acclaimed doctor and writer discusses emergency tracheotomies and flesh-eating bacteria.

SURGEON AND BEST-SELLING AUTHOR Dr. Atul Gawande practices at Brigham and Women's and Dana-Farber. Born in New York, Gawande was raised in Ohio and went to Stanford as an undergrad. After a Rhodes Scholarship, he graduated from Harvard Medical School, later earning a master's degree from Harvard in public health. He served as a senior health-policy adviser in the Clinton administration, and since 1998 he has been a staff writer for the New Yorker. In addition to his hospital duties, Gawande's an associate professor of both surgery and public health policy at Harvard and the director of the WHO's Global Challenge for Safer Surgical Care. His memoir Complications was a finalist for the National Book Award in 2002, and his most recent work, Better, was published in 2007. Gawande has received a MacArthur Award for his research and writing. He lives with his wife, Kathleen Hobson, and their three children, Walker, Hattie and Hunter, in Newton.

Jonathan Soroff: I imagine a lot of people mispronounce your name.
Atul Gawande: The most common is O'Toole. In fact, my high school tennis coach called me "the Irishman."

Which is harder: surgery or writing?
Without question, writing. Surgery is stressful, but there's a routine to it. Writing is new every time.

Do you ever see your family?
I do. And I try to get seven, eight hours of sleep a night. So I end up trying to steal time. My wife is very aware that I steal time from her and the kids, but Sunday mornings I write. I write when I have a cancellation. I try to use that time, but when I need a long stretch to work on something, I'll clear my schedule and block out a week when I'm not in the operating room.

Are you more proud of being a surgeon at Brigham and Women's or a staff writer at the New Yorker*?*
That's tough, because my identity is as a surgeon and I just sort of take it for granted. It's just who I am. I suppose I could say I'm proud that I'm a surgeon, whereas a writer still feels like something I don't quite deserve to call myself yet.

Do all surgeons have a God complex?
No. In fact, the interesting thing about watching surgeons up close is the mix of fear and confidence that they function with. There's a science, and there are algorithms, and there's a predictability we try to impose on people, but then there's the reality that the patients don't all seem to have read the textbook. So you have to have a certain level of confidence that can look like arrogance, but you have to have the arrogance to open people up and enough fear to know that anything can go wrong.

Do you think doctors are underpaid?
No. I'll probably get in trouble for saying it, but the United States rewards its physicians better than almost anywhere in the world. We're well compensated for what we do, and I, for one, am grateful for it.

What's the single biggest problem with our health care system today?
That we're not committed to ensuring that everyone can get the best health care [available]. We're not committed to making sure that financially they can afford good care. We don't recognize that there are major gaps in our care that we can close.

One thing you'd never want to face medically?
I can think of a long list, but I'll just throw out flesh-eating bacteria. It is rare, but it can hit anybody and it kills upwards of two-thirds of the people who get it.

Single most important quality in a surgeon?
An ability to recognize failure. How a person grapples with their failures determines the difference between being mediocre and being great. The worst surgeons are people who can't admit their mistakes.

Best way for people to choose a doctor?
We have no good way. You have more information on how to buy a car than which doctor to go to, so we're left to word of mouth, or the board of registration Web site or, perhaps most usefully, you can ask someone in health care what they think of someone. We should do a lot better than that.

Greatest medical advance of the last 100 years?
Antibiotics. Of the last 20 years, it would be statistics—the creation of a way to look at results and know whether certain kinds of care are working and what isn't.

Ever get grossed out by the blood and guts?
No, but I don't like amputations. They still sort of gross me out. Feet, for whatever reason. Amputating toes is just not my thing.

How would you fare if you had to do a tracheotomy on someone using a ballpoint pen?
One of my colleagues had to do a tracheotomy on someone at Grill 23 when they choked on something. I'm assuming he used a steak knife, because he didn't have a scalpel on him. I've had to intubate someone at the baggage carousel at the Toronto airport once, and it was no fun at all. It did the job, though, till they could get the correct instruments.

What's the biggest ethical dilemma you ever had to face?
One that immediately comes to mind was a religious person who wanted us to continue care for his mother whose express wishes were that she be let go. She was no longer able to speak for herself, and her son was insisting that we operate. That was a tough one.

Do you have any hobbies?
I'm an avid follower of the indie-rock scene and go to concerts regularly. And tennis is the lone way I have a shot at remaining fit.

Any unfulfilled career goals?
I never got to be a rock star. If I could have, I'd have given it all up.

Highest point in your career?
I was between two operations, taking a break, and I got a phone call saying that I was a finalist for the National Book Award.

Lowest point?
Last week, when I almost lost somebody.

Last question: Do you want to be remembered as a surgeon or a writer?
I don't know. I struggle with that one. I don't want to be remembered as a surgeon-writer. I would love to be remembered as a writer, but not as a writer who happened to do surgery, because surgery is very important to me. Neither by itself feels adequate. ×××

SPRING ROMANCE

The season's best trends feel sweetly flirtatious.

The latest fashions have given us a touch of spring fever. How could we not be charmed by the pretty prints, sherbet shades and soft fabrics (not to mention the abundance of bows, flowers and ruffles!) that graced the runways? Check out our favorite looks and start your own love affair with the season's easy styles.

The slim sum. The skinny on menswear: When it comes to formal attire, stick to the straight and narrow. Pair with an equally slim tie for a less buttoned-up look, skip the neckwear.
Jacket, $465, and pants, $235; both by APC at Stel's. Shirt by Dries Van Noten, $325 at Louis Boston.

Art-inspired prints. Designers turned to galleries for inspiration, using artistic splashes and brush-stroke patterns reminiscent of many modern masters.

Dress by Thakoon, $1,195 at Barneys New York. Shoes by Opening Ceremony, $315 at Louis Boston. Bangles, $17 each at High Gear Jewelry. Ring by Jewelers Guild, $400 at Good.

Out of Africa. The safari trend is back. This time around, look for lots of khaki and cargo pockets, as well as full skirts and tailoring that bring to mind Meryl Streep's Karen Blixen.

On her: jacket, $1,850, and dress, $1,575; both by Proenza Schouler. Shoes by Opening Ceremony, $345; hat by Albertus, $295; and belt by Mint, $155. All at Louis Boston. Ring, $48 at High Gear Jewelry. On him: jacket, $975, and shirt, $325; both by Dries Van Noten at Louis Boston.

Country club chic. Tennis, anyone? Revisit posh, preppy pieces like tennis sweaters and knife-pleat skirts to create an elegant, nostalgic style that suggests Daisy Buchanan and good ol' Gatsby.

On her: dress by Marc by Marc Jacobs, $370 at Saks Fifth Avenue. Necklace, $48 at High Gear Jewelry. On him: sweater, $185, shirt, $65, and pants, $98; all by Polo by Ralph Lauren at Bloomingdale's.

Sheer brilliance. Peekaboo fabrics like chiffon, organza and tulle come in unexpected pieces like a softly tailored blazer.

Jacket by MaxMara, $860, and skirt by Miu Miu, $590; both at Saks Fifth Avenue. Shoes by Opening Ceremony, $345 at Louis Boston. Necklace by Misha, $615 at Good.

Sherbet shades—sweet, pretty colors are equally hot for guys and girls. Wear with white or other neutrals or to be truly bold, mix them together.

On her: Trophy Slim, $196 at Lord + Taylor. Sweater by Alice + Olivia, $495 at Bloomingdale's. Pants by Adam Lippes, $275 at Dress. Orchid necklace by Finn, $49 at Urban Outfitters.

Prints charming. Let playful patterns like paisley lighten up a classic black suit or add pizzazz to your basic blue jeans. Don't want to get too crazy? Simply steer clear of multicolor prints.

Shirt by Etro, $355 at Barneys New York. Jacket, $595, and pants, $235; both by Theory at Neiman Marcus.

Minimalism 2.0. Clean lines and pared-down designs are in vogue again. Today's minimalist look includes light shapes, shades and fabrics that create a much softer feel than the tougher '90s incarnation.

On her: dress — Prada, $1,265 at Saks Fifth Avenue. Shoes by Cynthia Vincent, $250. Dress, cuff — Vivo, $38. Hood. On him: sweater, $185, and pants, $235, both by Theory at Saks Fifth Avenue. Shoes — Ferragamo, $550 at Neiman Marcus.

AUDIO FROM VISUALS

In a world of stifling hipster irony, the Everyday Visuals wear their skinny jeans with a refreshing cheeriness. Originally from New Hampshire, after moving to Boston the band shed members like layers in springtime, but steady frontman Christopher Pappas kept the ensemble true to its independent roots. On their latest album, Things Will Look Up, Pappas and the boys steer clear of cavity-inducing lyrics, opting instead for bittersweet tracks tinged with hopeful expectations. Blending alt-country and noise rock with a sprinkling of electronic beats, the group has been known to charm the Converse sneakers off teen girls and tough critics alike. They hit T.T. the Bear's Place on Feb. 23.

Atonement ★★★ Director Joe Wright, who helmed 2005's rollicking, dynamic take on Pride and Prejudice, reteams with Keira Knightley, this time to tackle Ian McEwan's epic WWII downer. The first hour suggests we might be in for a masterpiece, as cinematographer Seamus McGarvey's camera restlessly prowls through the English country estate where Knightley's poor little rich girl pines for James McAvoy's hapless gardener. Class resentments simmer; sexual tensions sizzle; and a few tragic misunderstandings hurtle things headlong into disaster. Then along comes that pesky war, and Christopher Hampton's screenplay switches gears into more abstract, literary territory, and these vibrant flesh-and-blood characters recede into symbols. Wright desperately tries to hold our attention with an array of visual trickery, but even a breathtakingly staged, unbroken steadicam shot, winding its way around thousands of extras at the Dunkirk evacuation, can't touch the close-quartered intimacy of those early reels. The final kicker is a purely literary flourish, one that connects in the head but not the heart. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

The Bucket List ★½ There's not a schmaltzy self-help cliché that doesn't show up somewhere in Justin Zackham's screenplay for this soppy tearjerker, which stars Jack Nicholson and Morgan Freeman as terminal cancer patients who embark on a wild road trip and learn banal life lessons along the way. No points for guessing that Nicholson's sardonic, loutish billionaire discovers all sorts of wisdom from the sage, salt-of-the-earth Freeman. Why is an actor as dynamic as Freeman so often cast as a healing force of neutered sanctimony? Does anybody remember his terrifying breakthrough performance as a vicious pimp in 1987's Street Smart? The man can do more than nod and teach people how to be good. Director Rob Reiner laughably phones it in, as this alleged globetrotting adventure has quite brazenly been photographed on a Los Angeles soundstage. There hasn't been such shameless use of stock footage and shots of actors in front of fake backgrounds since the late '30s. (At Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Cassandra's Dream ★½ Another tired trawl through a godless universe from Woody Allen, who these days seems to approach his annual directorial effort with an air of resignation. Working the same terrain as his 1989 masterpiece Crimes and Misdemeanors, a film he's been remaking incessantly lately, Cassandra's Dream stars Ewan McGregor and Colin Farrell as working-class blokes with dodgy accents who find themselves ensnared in a half-written murder plot, thanks to an insufficiently frightening uncle played by Tom Wilkinson. Allen's on autopilot to the point of self-parody, dropping laughably unsubtle references to Greek tragedy and forcing his characters to stand around for scenes on end discussing the heaviness of the film's incoherent themes. McGregor brays his way through a role that's mostly exposition, but Farrell comes off slightly better by playing up his often unremarked vulnerability. Allen's films used to be cultural events. Lately, they feel more like obligations. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Charlie Bartlett ★½ A perplexing mashup of Rushmore, Pump Up the Volume and any 1980s John Hughes flick, director John Poll's confused ode to overmedicated youth stars the charmless Anton Yelchin as a poor, little rich kid expelled from countless private academies before becoming an extremely unlikely cult hero at a ramshackle public school. At first picked on for wearing a blazer and tie, the pompous lad soon starts holding impromptu bathroom psychotherapy sessions for his troubled classmates, recklessly distributing antidepressants and indulging them in the usual "parents just don't understand" sloganeering. Things take an even stranger turn when the students revolt against security cameras installed by their clueless principal, who, unsurprisingly, turns out to be just as depressed and confused as the kids he's attempting to discipline. The great Robert Downey Jr. works his typical magic with this largely unplayable role, and we share his befuddlement that a squishy, little nonpresence like Yelchin's Bartlett could inspire a mass rebellion. Ferris Bueller, he's not. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Charlie Wilson's War ★★½ It should've been the movie of the year. Begging for pointed satire, the true-life saga of a Texas congressman (Tom Hanks) covertly arming and training the Afghan mujahideen is a ripe example of American vic-

HIT MEN ON HOLIDAY

In Bruges refreshes a stale genre.

In Bruges
★★★½
Starring Colin Farrell, Brendan Gleeson, Ralph Fiennes, Clémence Poésy and Jordan Prentice. Written and directed by Martin McDonagh. At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.

I WAS CHANNEL SURFING the other night and happened to land on Pulp Fiction. Sure enough, I wound up watching the whole thing for the first time in ages. We've seen so many imitations over the past 14 years and nearly forgotten what a dose of originality the film represented. Hit men having casual, matter-of-fact conversations juxtaposed with shocking violence seemed novel and exciting. Now it's a genre all its own, and taking into account the work of Guy Ritchie, not a particularly impressive one.

Just when I thought we could go the rest of our lives without another indie about foul-mouthed, wise-cracking killers, U.K. playwright Martin McDonagh's droll, affecting debut accomplishes the impossible and breathes life into the moldy, pulp-fiction tropes. Closer in spirit to Elaine May's Mikey and Nicky or the works of John Cassavetes than any Tarantino knockoff, In Bruges is a shaggy, discursive trip into purgatory with two ratty souls who may yet be saved. continued on page 62

Purgatory, in this case, is in Belgium. The preserved medieval city of Bruges, with its canals, architectural marvels and hordes of morbidly obese American tourists, serves as a Dante-esque way station for chattery, presumably doomed anti-heroes Ray (Colin Farrell) and Ken (Brendan Gleeson). Fresh from some badly botched London wet work, Ray is a bundle of nerves and reckless energy. A flashback reveals the shocking sin that looms on Ray's conscience, and Farrell's performance jerks wildly from suicidal despair to comedic effervescence, the transitions assisted by the massive amounts of controlled substances Ray ingests then compulsively lists to whomever he's sharing a room with. It's the best work yet from this talented, if erratic, young actor.

Brendan Gleeson is a calm, deadpan delight as Ken. Ray's sad-eyed mentor sees this mob-ordered time-out as a chance "to strike a balance between culture and fun." Ken has little patience for the lad's drug-fueled misadventures, and there's something about the city that's getting under his skin. The pervasive sense of ancient history has him feeling more reflective than usual. There's also the phone call Ken knows is coming, with instructions he's not sure he's ready to carry out.

Surrounded by Hieronymus Bosch paintings and other conspicuous hints of the afterlife, the two blokes have a fine time getting on one another's nerves while picking fights with bovine Americans and even dragging some poor

For all the drugs, fisticuffs and vulgarity, In Bruges is surprisingly spiritual.

Canadians into the mix. In Bruges has the slack rhythms of the genre often called "the hangout movie." Invented by Howard Hawks with the great Rio Bravo, and more recently exemplified in Jon Favreau's woefully underrated Made, it's the sort of film where incident and plot take a backseat to character riffs and downtime in drab settings. It should come as no surprise then that circumstances find our boys up all night snorting coke with a bigoted dwarf with a fondness for prostitutes (Jordan Prentice) and jawing nonsense about a coming race war.

A bad boy of the British theater, McDonagh has included something to offend everyone. What's surprising is that for all the drugs, fisticuffs and vulgarity, In Bruges is surprisingly spiritual. A genuine sadness seeps in through the corners of nearly every scene. There's a heavy helping of Irish Catholic angst with real questions of sin and redemption. McDonagh's unsubtle visuals never pass up the chance for an ominous portent, but his dialogue effectively stirs the truth lying beneath the pitter-patter dialogue. Gleeson's placid exterior can't quite cover a bone-weary inner disappointment, and Farrell's garrulous trouble-maker often seems like a lost little boy. Though loath to admit it, Ray and Ken know they've come to Belgium for a reckoning.

Enter Ralph Fiennes' Cockney mob boss, a reptilian creature with spiky hair and gnarly teeth incapable of putting two words together without at least one expletive in between. It's a kick watching a classy, restrained thespian like Fiennes getting his fingers dirty, and he has one dinner scene with Gleeson that devolves into such a brilliantly sustained aria of four-letter-words, I actually applauded.

McDonagh loses his grip when it comes for the final Biblical bloodletting, but by then he's earned a mulligan or two. Despite all the familiar hit men and Indie-Flick 101 trappings, In Bruges has something unique to say and a roguish way of saying it, which mixes the sacred, the sidesplitting and the profane. ✖✖✖ tories coming back to bite us on the backside. But working from a sharp and extremely funny script by West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin (here making amends for his odious Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip), director Mike Nichols chickens out by softening all the body-blows with broad comedic flourishes and abruptly pulling the plug before the logical ending. Still, Hanks is a joy to watch as the debauched do-gooder, bantering back and forth with Philip Seymour Hoffman's movie-stealing CIA crank. Wildly miscast as a voracious millionaire man-eater, Julia Roberts does a lousy Susan Sarandon impression. There are enough meaty moments to make the film almost worthwhile, but it's too bad Nichols pulled so many punches. (At Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Cloverfield ★★½ A triumph of gimmickry from huckster JJ Abrams, this savvily constructed bit of stuntwork purports to be camcorder footage found after a devastating attack by a giant lizard, who we can only assume isn't called Godzilla due to copyright restrictions. Basically The Blair Witch Project's dumber, bigger-budget sibling, Cloverfield begins at an insufferable party full of vapid Manhattan 20-somethings, then sends us on a shaky, handheld nightmare through panicked streets after the inane love story is rudely interrupted by the Statue of Liberty's decapitation. If you can forget the hundreds of preposterous logistical quandaries—something that shouldn't be difficult, as the movie is already about a skyscraper-sized monster—it's a bracing ride. Kudos to the ground-level perspective and queasy, you-are-there immediacy maintained by director Matt Reeves and cinematographer Michael Bonvillian. Clocking in at less than 90 minutes, Cloverfield has the good sense to end just when the novelty is starting to wear off. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Definitely, Maybe ★½ Billed as a romantic comedy despite not being particularly romantic or comedic, writer-director Adam Brooks' brutally overlong feature stars Ryan Reynolds as a divorcing dad who decides to tell his cloying 11-year-old daughter (Little Miss Sunshine's Abigail Breslin, suddenly far too aware of her own cuteness) the story of how he met her mother. For reasons that don't make any sense, Reynolds changes everybody's name and launches into an epic bedtime dissertation on his entire dating history, keeping the kid in a cheap, pointless suspense as to which of these gals will turn out to be her actual mom. Is it Elizabeth Banks' sketchily drawn, Wisconsin good girl? Or maybe it's Rachel Weisz's hard-nosed journalist? How about Isla Fisher's dippy, free spirit? The more important question is who cares? None of these women are especially fascinating, and they don't have much reason to be interested in Reynolds, a tedious blank who somehow spends 16 years in New York City running into the same three women. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Diving Bell and the Butterfly ★★½ Formerly a famous irritant on the 1980s New York art scene, painter Julian Schnabel has evolved into a fascinating filmmaker, helming unconventional, if spotty, biographical pieces boasting kicky, exploratory visuals. The Diving Bell and the Butterfly tells the tale of Elle magazine editor Jean-Dominique Bauby, felled by a stroke and unable to move anything but his left eyelid. The condition, described here as "locked-in syndrome," hardly kept Bauby from penning his memoirs. It just took a bit more work than expected. Schnabel shoots huge chunks of the movie from his protagonist's point of view, the screen cutting to black as he communicates by blinking. As Bauby, Mathieu Almeric, the Roman Polanski look-alike who stole so many scenes in Steven Spielberg's Munich, brings a dry wit to the narration and finds sneaky ways around his role's obvious restrictions. Like Schnabel's Basquiat and Before Night Falls, Diving Bell is maddeningly inconsistent but has a lyrical sense of freedom. It's anything but locked-in. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Four Months, Three Weeks and Two Days ★★★ It's not a knock to call Cristian Mungiu's drama punishing, as the movie is a grinding, expertly crafted slice of Eastern European misery. Winner of the Palme D'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival and scandalously absent from this year's list of foreign language Oscar nominees, the movie keeps the camera at a discreet distance, adopting a cinéma vérité style as we follow kind-hearted Otilia (Anamaria Marinca) hustling around crumbling 1980s Romania trying to arrange an illegal abortion for her hapless roommate (Laura Vasiliu). Mungiu plays scenes out for longer than you expect, shooting in wide screen with a static camera that lingers on details and inferences inside haunting, prolonged silences. Extraordinarily well wrought, the movie is also a bit fuzzy and hard to pin down. Is Otilia a saint, a flesh-and-blood character, or just an angry filmmaker's symbolic dumping ground for a cruel world's abuses and ills? (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Royal Err-ess

Nottie Is Shoddy Paris Hilton and Christine Lakin team up in The Hottie and the Nottie. Hilarious hijinks do not ensue.

The Hottie and the Nottie ½★ Is Paris Hilton finally done? The opening weekend, $225-per-screen box-office average earned by this amateurish train wreck reveals that the vapid heiress brought in two or three customers every time the movie played. That's two or three too many. Gangly, unappealing Joel David Moore stars as a dopey slacker fixated on childhood sweetheart Hilton, who won't so much as go on a date with the lanky bore unless he can find a boyfriend for her deformed best friend June (Christine Lakin). In the vile, empty world of this film, June must receive thousands of dollars worth of plastic surgery before our hero realizes she's his true love. How's that for a morality tale? Unprofessional on every front, the movie suffers from underexposed cinematography, substandard audio and shoddy production values. Were it not for Hilton's giggle-inducing credit as executive producer, a film this low rent would normally never make it into theatrical release. It's just another one of her junky products. (In the suburbs.)

cious tale of teenage pregnancy that's more concerned with glib one-liners and arcane pop culture references than recognizable human emotion. The overqualified cast includes Ellen Page as a precocious and knocked-up 16-year-old, and Superbad's Michael Cera, pricelessly inarticulate as the baby daddy. Dependable character actors JK Simmons, Jason Bateman and Allison Janney wrestle whatever feeling they can out of Cody's one-note smarm, but director Jason Reitman undercuts their efforts with too-cute flourishes and an aura of smug self-satisfaction rivaling that of his similarly over-praised debut, Thank You for Smoking. Juno is already a hit, which is no surprise considering how much it aims to flatter its target audience. Mileage may vary, depending on your tolerance for hipster affectations. Personally, I felt like I was trapped in Allston past my bedtime. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Fenway, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

No Country for Old Men ★★★★ Adapted from the 2005 novel by Cormac McCarthy, Joel and Ethan Coen's No Country for Old Men is an enthralling, devastating movie experience. Stripped to the bone, it's a model of ruthless narrative efficiency that blossoms into something much larger than the sum of its precision-tooled parts. What at first seems like the simple saga of two tough hombres and a bag of money eventually attains a mythic, almost Biblical grandeur. For days afterwards, it haunts your dreams—the bad ones. The Coens have at last gone back to their roots, infusing No Country with the clockwork meticulousness and parched landscapes of their killer 1984 debut, Blood Simple. The movie is almost unbearably suspenseful and boasts the filmmakers' trademark strain of sicko gallows humor. But there's also something new here: a palpable sense of sorrow and genuine emotional resonance. For the first time in their brilliant career, it finally feels like the merry pranksters are out to do more than crack themselves up. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Persepolis ★★★½ Buoyant and irreverent, Marjane Satrapi's best-selling coming-of-age comic book memoir springs to life as the simplicity of black-and-white line drawings trump the computer-generated marvels we've grown accustomed to. Growing up as an outspoken female in Iran sounds like the formula for a movie far less lively, but the tone boasts a sardonic wit matching that of its spitfire heroine. (No surprise then that Satrapi directed the film along with French animator Vincent Paronnaud.) Her childhood memories of the Shah's fall and the subsequent rise of Islamic fundamentalism offer a refreshing, humanistic point of view on Middle Eastern history. Young Satrapi's punk-rock attitude and black-market Iron Maiden cassettes lead to a brief exile in Vienna before she returns and, quite movingly, attempts to assimilate into a culture where she's no longer welcome. Persepolis is funny, rambling and sad, and a welcome reminder that stubborn individualism can be found where we least expect it. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Rambo ★½ Sshh... nobody tell Sylvester Stallone what year it is. A sad and grotesque spectacle, Sly's latest comeback attempt exploits the inhuman cruelty currently going on in Myanmar as an excuse to make Rambo really angry. After sixty years of civil war, the junta has finally threatened the wrong white people and pissed off a former American movie star. Paying no attention to pesky matters like spatial geography or screen direction, Stal-

Golden Years

Sitting around your living room with friends, criticizing ball gowns and screaming expletives at the TV gets pretty old. So with the writers' strike all but over, it's time to celebrate in style. The Brattle Theatre is hosting its eighth annual Oscar Party and fundraiser Feb. 24, where guests can dress up and watch the historic event on the big screen. Try to abstain from throwing popcorn; this isn't your apartment.

lone's eventual orgy of mayhem plunks the 61-year-old at the turret of a .50-caliber machine gun and marvels at the way an anti-aircraft weapon can shred the human body. There are geysers of viscera, countless severed limbs and exploding heads, but nothing resembling basic filmmaking competence. Sly comes off like Mel Gibson, with all sorts of creepy, psychosexual, violent hang-ups but lacking the crucial visual prowess. Rambo looks shoddy, cheap and indistinguishable from any '80s grindhouse craptacular like The Exterminator series or the collected output of Golan and Globus. Sometimes you can't go home again. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Savages ★★★½ Grim, funny and unsentimental, writer-director Tamara Jenkins' follow-up to her 1998 dysfunctional-family comedy, Slums of Beverly Hills, stars Philip Seymour Hoffman and Laura Linney as sourpuss siblings facing difficult decisions as their estranged, abusive father (Philip Bosco) heads toward dementia. If you think this is going to be a sweet comedy of familial reconciliation, take another look at that surname. Muted in tone and clad beneath a brilliantly shabby production design, The Savages has a humdrum grit often missing even from indie movies. The more unsavory aspects of contemporary eldercare are confronted in a similarly blunt fashion with a minimum of speechifying. Hoffman and Linney are, as usual, extraordinary. Like most siblings facing a crisis, they fall back into the roles assigned to them in childhood. There's no grand deathbed catharsis and no monologues about lessons learned. When all is said and done, the characters have merely slouched ever so slightly closer to adulthood. The movie feels tough, and true. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street ★★★ This isn't your kid sister's musical. Drenched in rivers of blood, Sweeney Todd is a black-hearted, at times disgustingly comic meditation on the price of vengeance. As luck would have it, Steven Sondheim's gory extravaganza is exactly what director Tim Burton needed to get his groove back. Sweeney Todd is his best picture in years—ghoulishly delightful and subversive. There is a clarity and completeness of vision marking a welcome return to Burton's mischievous Goth sensibility. Johnny Depp stars as the wronged barber who sates his thirst for retribution by slitting the throats of his customers and tossing their corpses into the basement, where his daffy old landlady (played with dizzy deadpan timing by Helena Bonham Carter) grinds up the bodies and bakes them into pies. Depp and Bonham Carter are wonderful, save for one teensy caveat: They can't sing. Burton's swooping, inventive camerawork and the soul-stirring orchestrations too often soar towards transcendence, only to be dragged down by the pedestrian vocalizing. (At Boston Common and Harvard Square.)

SURVIVAL SKILLS

Sia plays the Paradise Rock Club March 5.

MOMENTS BEFORE a scheduled interview comes the news: Sia Furler needs to postpone because a water main burst in her New York neighborhood, cutting power to her apartment. "It created a river that went down the road four blocks," the Australian-born singer says the next day after plugging in her cellphone and grabbing a "really big cookie" for the conversation. "It was like something out of a movie."

Luckily, a nearby friend still had a working oven and the shared will to experiment. "I tried to make a cookie in the shape of an RV last night, but it didn't work 'cause it really spread out," says Sia, who goes by her first name professionally. "Go on eBay and type in 'RV' or 'RV cookie cutter.' You can get fuckin' anything on eBay. My friend's into RVs, so I thought it would be a good present."

Leave it to Sia, 32, to find her refuge in a camper-shaped cookie. She's prone to whimsical impulses that fly in contrast to her impeccably crafted, atmospheric pop, distinguished mostly by her vibrato-carved voice.

Her personality and perspective are partly shaped from a transient life in major hubs. "I'm a runner," Sia says, recalling lyrics from the soulful "Day Too Soon" ("I've been running all my life, I ran away, I ran away from good") on her new disc Some People Have Real Problems. "I need a lot of stimulation and I'm bored easily."

Sia began her career in London, almost accidentally. "I was going to see a friend and had a world ticket, but I guess I got stuck there 'cause suddenly I had a record deal," she says of joining the electro-soul group Zero 7. "I'd only ever been a waitress, a nanny, an ice-cream scooper and a cleaner, so this was the best job I'd ever had."

However, Sia says she grew unhappy in London and suffered a nervous breakdown that led to $50,000 worth of therapy. "I had a lot of uncomfortable experiences there, because the quality of living is low and the cost is high," she says. "It's tough to survive if you're used to the high life, which, as an Australian, I am. You don't have to be rich to have an amazing quality of life in Australia. Everything is affordable and it's a beautiful place."

So the singer-songwriter moved to Los Angeles, where she recorded the upbeat Some People Have Real Problems. "You can hear the tone of this album is much lighter, and that's definitely been my experience in L.A.," says Sia, who forged new relationships that include such musical collaborators as Beck, who turns the new CD's "Academia" into a haunting duet. "Once you create a community for yourself, [L.A.] is a really nice, fun, silly place. And the weather is amazing, and nature is there and you can go on walks and have dogs."

Nonetheless, Sia and her two dogs have since resettled in the Big Apple, where she acquired an apartment "on a whim." On a more thoughtful note, she has also been thinking about adoption. "I've been incredibly spoilt by having the most amazing management [team]," says Sia, who performs at the Paradise March 5. "They know the less I'm stressed about, the more productive I am. So they do silly things—like they pay my bills and things—that make you lose touch with reality. And I made a promise to myself that I could only adopt a child when I was willing to do the paperwork myself."

Surely she's making enough money to pay the bills, starting with her success on TV. Her music has been heard on Grey's Anatomy, Brothers & Sisters and, most notably, Six Feet Under, where her melancholy "Breathe Me" played over the life-closing scenes of the series finale.

"I was so insecure before," Sia says. "Now the good thing is I know that I'm a good person, and a cool and credible person. I don't need my music to reflect that. Isn't it funny that when I finally get comfortable and put out the stuff that I was always ashamed to put out, which is cheesy pop, it's the first time I've really sold any records?" ✖✖✖

Rhyme of the Times

Taking the Rap It says something about this city's character that Akrobatik, one of Boston's foremost rappers, is arguably more famous for his sports commentary than for his music. As the "Sports Rap-Up" guy on Jam'N 94.5's "Ramiro & Peebles" morning show, Akrobatik has the unusual job of rapping about the day's sports scores, meaning he's probably the only person in history to have written a rhyme using the words "Junior Seau." On Feb. 24, Akrobatik and his colleague from the Perceptionists, Mr. Lif, reunite at the Middle East to release Akrobatik's new album, Absolute Value.

Road to Somewhere

Boston-based photographer John Goodman's résumé includes collaborations with Vanity Fair, Gucci and the upcoming Sex and the City movie. Forgoing the Cosmos and Jimmy Choos, Goodman turns to Coney Island beaches and other classic American images in Moving Pictures, appearing at the Howard Yezerski Gallery through March 11. Slick black-and-white images of mandolin-plucking 20-somethings and bull-riding cowboys may having you longing to hit the road yourself and see exotic locales like Nashville or Tulsa.

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

THE REEL WORLD

[FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19]
Cuspy Pisces, of which there are many, should be lining up to receive the full impact of the lunar eclipse on Feb. 20. For the next few days you may be encouraged to exert your will over a coworker or your partner. But after the sun confronts strict, play-by-the-rules Saturn in your Virgo marriage house on Feb. 24, who knows what'll follow? Fish tend to circumvent situations that limit alternatives; however, until Venus and Mercury get to your sign in March, it won't be easy to charm your way through this roadblock.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
Rams are usually in a rush to move on to the next thing—the bigger and more exciting, the better. Instead, consider holding the reins in check, waiting to see what'll happen after retro Mercury turned direct in forward-thinking Aquarius. With amenable Venus' entrance last weekend into this compatible air sign, the tone at work and your boss' demeanor could become much friendlier. Not so on the playing field or cruising the clubs. The full-moon eclipse on the Feb. 20 may accentuate the pall Saturn has thrown over recreation and romance.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
You may be privy to information that other people in your circle aren't. Whether the news pleases or makes you antsy depends on how willing—forget about eager—you are to incorporate a sudden change into your current plans. Your amenable Venus ruler has left the tried-and-true pecking order governed by Capricorn for the lofty, egalitarian principles of Aquarius. Whether in the guise of a woman in your field or a popular online project, Venus' transit through your career house may present one challenge after another.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Turn on the printer, charge the phone, press "record" and prepare to get back into the communications game. After your Mercury ruler turned direct in electromagnetic, satellite-friendly Aquarius on President's Day, the gizmos that shut down should begin to work again. Still, give yourself time to watch the effects of the lunar eclipse, particularly if your birthday falls in May. These are the Twins who've been trying hard to adjust to Saturn's restrictions, so that everyone at home can feel comfortable.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
How big a perfectionist are you? Are the family jewels safe and must you make a major purchase right now? A lunar eclipse, especially the one on Feb. 20 in your Virgo house of values and valuables, can augur a difficult time for the Moon Child. Biding your time to see what evolves should alter your approach to an important financial matter. How long? Until militant Mars re-enters Cancer on March 4 and reinforces your role as a concerned caretaker or until data-gathering Mercury visits your house of other people's money.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
Granted, your sun ruler's transit through emotional Pisces might soften the Lion's regal stance and make you more of a pussy. Nonetheless, the sun's supportive sextile this week to passionate, persuasive Pluto in your house of romance isn't about hearts and flowers as much as strength and endurance. Add the ego boost you get while the Virgo full moon is eclipsed and you'll be ready to stare down whatever problem Saturn puts in your path when it opposes the sun the weekend of Feb. 23. Meanwhile, the partnership works like a charm.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22]
The lunar eclipse in your sign on Feb. 20 primarily affects Virgins born close to the Leo cusp, e.g., Ron Paul and Mike Huckabee. They might lose something while the Virgo full moon is dark or become discombobulated by the chaotic Pisces sun. The September-born can relax and enjoy the sociability extended while your Mercury ruler, direct since President's Day, escorts affable, attractive Venus through popular, politically active Aquarius from now through mid-March. After that, who knows what that marriage will bring?

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
The general tenor of the times could have lightened up once your Venus ruler left earthbound Capricorn for sociable Aquarius, a fellow air sign. After Venus catches up with informative Mercury, facing forward as of Feb. 18, your communication skills will improve dramatically. Playwrights and sales personnel take note. For the next six weeks, these two very personal planets will forge a friendship you'll enjoy at work and at play. Out of a field of Bulls, Twins, Virgins and Fish, you can pick your next partner.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
In water there is strength. This week, the sun in your Pisces house of creativity, children and fun forms an opportunistic sextile to your Pluto coruler. From this positive connection a renewed sense of purpose and productivity can evolve. Then, when your take-action Mars coruler returns to nurturing Cancer, you'll be able to deal with a long-standing concern about other people's money with a fresh perspective. Although it may seem like nothing much is happening, Scorpios are in the middle of a regeneration.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Must be the season of the witch again. Not every year, but often enough—i.e., when solar Pisces kicks in—Centaurs tend to get flak from the family. For the next few weeks, the tension generated by a close relationship could become downright testy because of acerbic Mars in your Gemini partnership zone. The lunar eclipse in Virgo doesn't help matters since the effects of this phenomenon can take three months to manifest. On the upside, the witch gets maternal again after Mars returns to comforting Cancer on March 4.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
Goats are in good shape, particularly if you were born close to Christmas. Around Feb. 19, the artistic Pisces sun forms an opportunistic sextile to Pluto at the beginning of your sign. This is the first of the positive aspects slow-moving Pluto will receive over the next 15 years, so pay particular attention to the kind of power you attract. Then on Feb. 24, the sun, by opposing your Saturn ruler in earth sign–friendly Virgo might bring a matter involving other people's money to a head, but not to a resolution until May.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
The willful, life-affirming sun may have left your sign but that's a small price to pay for having magnetic, affectionate Venus come stay for a month. Not a bad trade-off. The addition of Venus to your sign can help you look more attractive, plus present your kinder, gentler side. People will respond well to what you're saying because Mercury, no longer retrograde as of President's Day, hooks up with the goddess for the duration. Even if you're not a lot smarter, at least you'll have the facts straight.

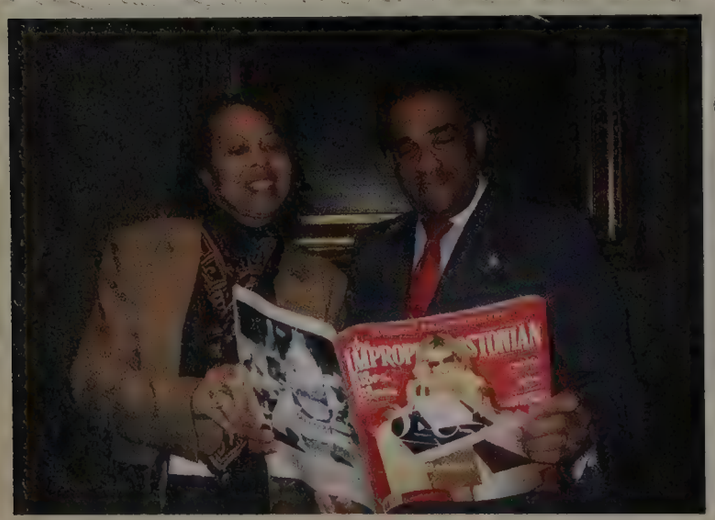
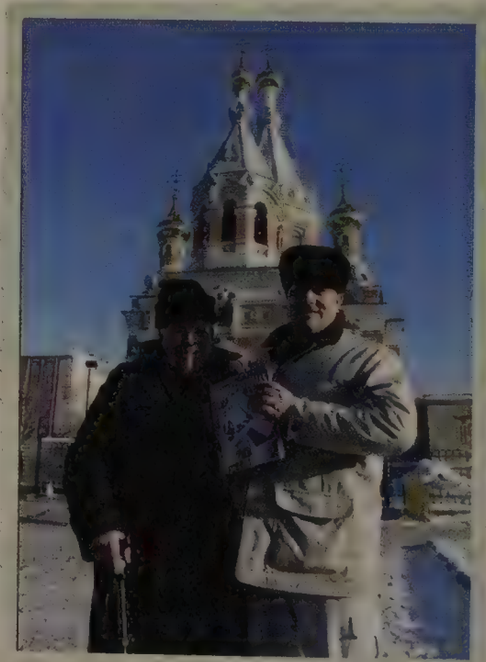
Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Ashley DeTillio and Annelise Cowie were hanging ten on Pfeiffer Beach in Big Sur, Calif. Earlier in the day they visited Little Sur but could only hang five.

While in Arva, Ireland, Brian Brady and Brigid O'Rourke stopped off at Thomas Brady, a pub that we won't have the emotional stability to visit for at least another couple months.



Ronald E Jones, mayor of Garland, Texas, is fully engaged in our Holiday Shopping Issue. His wife, Peggy? Well, we think she's doing a pretty good job of faking it.



Mark Malkovich III and Mark Malkovich IV brought the IMPROPER to Uralsk, Kazakhstan. Bet you think we're going to make a Borat joke here, but you're wrong. Nahhht.

Last Scene Here { JONATHAN SOROFF }

HUNGRY LIKE THE WOLF

In Appalachia, That's Normal...

Too many cooks might spoil the soup, but three is about right to host a Super Hunger Chef Challenge, which is what the Greater Boston Food Bank did at the Four Seasons.

Pigalle's Marc Orfaly, Rialto's Jody Adams and TV's lovable Liverpudlian John Ashton faced off in an Iron Chef–like competition, but the real winners were the guests who got to eat what they cooked, among them: ubiquitous partygoers Gary and Lynne Smith, restaurateur extraordinaire Steve DiFillippo, WAAF morning mouth Greg Hill (one of the judges) and unusually dapper comedian Tony V (the emcee). Then there was the woman who said, "My shoes are a half-size too small, but I love them so much I just drink till I don't notice," and the guy who said, "One man's breakfast is another man's hangover."

However, the evening's wittiest comment came from über-philanthropist Ted Cutler, whose generosity ensured that the event surpassed the $100,000 mark.

"To me, eating salmon's like kissing your sister," he said. "You'll do it, but you won't enjoy it."

Don't Say a Prayer for Me Now. Save It Till the Morning After...

Embarrassing admission: Not only does Duran Duran still sound good, they're still crush-worthy (AARP eligibility notwithstanding).

You would already know this if you were one of the lucky guests at Big Night—the Big Brothers Big Sisters fundraiser held at that leaky airplane hangar known as the South Boston Convention Center (not that the venue did anything to detract from the evening).

As close to a bacchanalian orgy as big-ticket benefits get in Boston, this one had the theme "Where Were You in '82?" and appropriately egregious costumes were de rigueur. On the guest list: gazillionaire co-chairs Jim Pallotta and Joe Ayoub, the former's minions, Peter Monaco and Alex Zecca with their wives, Sarah and Laura, nobody's minion Marty Mannion, and just about everybody else with a dizzying net worth and a good sense of humor who knows a fun time when they see it.

Joan and Randi Cutler at the Super Hunger Chef Challenge

Before rocking out to the aforementioned '80s icons, they enjoyed a four-course feast prepared by celebrity chefs Michael Schlow, Ming Tsai, Angela and Seth Raynor, and Sam Mason, not to mention the attention of bartenders who struggled valiantly to keep up with drink orders (and for the most part succeeded).

Steve DiFillippo at the Super Hunger Chef Challenge

Someone won the costume contest (and the chance to go backstage to hang out with the band), but the person who undoubtedly deserved to win was Schlow, who came dressed as the friend who stood him up for the evening: rock legend Peter Wolf. Wearing a black wig, porkpie hat and funereal duds, Schlow not only looked unmistakably like the J Geils frontman, but he was further proof that blues musicians and Hassidic Jews shop for clothing in the same places.

And the Winner Is...

The reader who guessed correctly that the honkin' big diamond ring in the previous "Last Scene Here" belonged to kabuki socialite Marilyn Riseman is Cary Lynch of Sovereign Bank. Congratulations, Cary! The IMPROPER has made a $200 donation in your name to the Dana-Farber Cancer Center. ×××

Who Wore It Better?

No, we weren't seeing double, despite the champagne flowing like... well, like champagne's supposed to. Spotted at the opening of the Liberty Hotel's new Veuve Clicquot Grande Dame Bar (the first in this country): two gorgeous and glamorous young things, Allison Mazer and Cindy Erwin, wearing the exact same dress (we didn't discuss sizes). We think they both look smashing, but anyone who'd like to weigh in with an opinion can e-mail jonathan@improper.com. Poll results will be published in the next issue.

Perfect Enough

A bridezilla is "a young woman who, upon becoming engaged, had been transformed from a person of reason and moderation into a self-absorbed monster, obsessed with her plans to stage the perfect wedding, an event of spectacular production values and flawless execution, with herself as the star of the show." That's according to New Yorker scribe Rebecca Mead in her 2007 book One Perfect Day. Not to be a bridal buzz kill, but reality TV has taught us that Mead describes a real phenomenon.

So the Improper is staging an intervention. Your big day is a big deal, but planning should be fun, not a job, and it should reflect you, not some Hollywood ideal. If you can't spend $50,000, don't spend $50,000. In these pages, you'll find the details for six styles of weddings from budget to hipster to green. I tied the knot at a vineyard in the Blue Ridge Mountains. I'm not sure if that says more about my love for wine or the outdoors. Either way, it was "perfect," even when a tropical storm arrived and the ceremony had to be moved into the barrel room.

I realize not all of you have marriage on the mind. Skip ahead to stories on three up-and-comers who happen to be single. There's Harvard grad Bitsie Tulloch, an actress on NBC's Quarterlife; Julie Donaldson, Channel 7's newest sports reporter; and Aoife O'Donovan, Crooked Still's lead singer. These are women who deserve to be the star of the show.

Wedding Belle

MARRY GO ROUND

Even a priest needs a confessor, and even a wedding consultant needs someone to taper the hem of her gown. Lauren Knight, a wedding consultant for Priscilla of Boston, is learning what it's like to sit on the other side of the fabric swatches.

"You always hear the term 'bridezilla,'" says Knight, 27. "But I haven't found as many angry brides as they say there are." Knight's day job is to pilot ladies through a treacherous web of lace, satin and very shiny bodices. Now that she's walking the aisle herself, she's approaching her work with a new perspective. "I can understand what the brides are trying to communicate. It puts me at a great level."

But even a wedding planner can't skirt every organizational pitfall. "A lot of brides think they have a whole year to plan, so they have a lot of time. Then they relax and end up having to do a lot at the end," she says. "I did that."

Despite a daily immersion in cakes and bouquets, Knight's not jaded. Her own nuptials will be "simple and classic," like the dress she's picked. Her best advice to herself: "When brides try to please other people, they end up unhappy. My advice is to do what you want."

ANDREW RIMAS

Good Eats

BETTER BURGER

Thanks to the comfort-food trend, upscale eateries are giving McDonald's a run for its dollar menu. Chefs around town have turned their attention to the basic burger, dressing it with ingredients like seared foie gras. So it's not that Radius' Michael Schlow broke the mold by serving his beef patty with fried onion wisps, aged cheddar and horseradish cream. It's just that, like his fall-apart rib eye and Scottish salmon, Schlow's burger benefits from his signature cooking method: slow roasting. A quick grill followed by a stint in a low-heat oven is, well, rare. The mouthwatering result took top honors at last month's South Beach Burger Bash, and it definitely beats the fast-food version—although the $17 price tag is a whopper.

ASK THE EXPERT

Q: WHEN SHE REJECTS YOUR WEDDING PROPOSAL, DO YOU SCRAP THE RELATIONSHIP OR SALVAGE IT?

MYRA DURKIN
LICENSED CLINICAL SOCIAL WORKER
MYRADURKIN.COM

Think about the whole relationship—what the chemistry between the two of you has been like, whether you are compatible, share the same values and can talk out conflicts. Check with friends you trust who have seen you together, and make sure you understand all your partner's reasons for saying no. If her reasons have to do with any of the above issues, it seems unlikely that she'll change her mind. However, if she acknowledges she has problems with commitment or another pattern of ending potentially healthy relationships, you might want stay in touch (as friends) to pick up clues about whether she's grown into being ready for marriage. No matter what you do, my advice is, don't hang around waiting, even if your partner does eventually come through. Keep meeting people. It can't hurt.

"I've been bartending since I was 18. I'm 31 now, so I'm pretty good at it."

Drink of the Moment

A Fine Swine

Pork through a straw. You're either lost or sold right there.

Recently opened for brunch, Fenway's Church needed drinks to draw the breakfast boozers. Motif-dependent, the venue's evening cocktails are divided among the Seven Deadly Sins. For the morning, bar manager Adam Grushey created the Demon Slayers.

"People are usually chasing demons from the night before," Grushey explains. Gimmickry may be his sin, but the man has a talent with the sauce.

Anticipating the hectic pace of brunch service, he designed beverages that could be made in two or three steps. In doing so, he capitalized on the growing trend of infusions. But you'll find no pineappley concoctions here. To accompany his house-made Bloody Mary blend, Grushey mixed vodka, bay leaves, pork skin and bacon, and let the compound age for two months. The result is the Angel Gabriel ($8).

Sucks from the straw draw bits of bacon—bigger than a flake, smaller than a slab. There's a slight kick of Tabasco, chili pepper and horseradish that's quickly soothed as the thick, smoky tomato liquid acts as a pork nectar. The mixture has a slick, comforting mouthfeel, the acid of your normal Bloody drowning in delicious rendered blubber.

With a garnish of a bacon-wrapped baby tomato, the Angel Gabriel calls for a sweeter breakfast for balance. There are flapjacks with homemade whipped cream ($9) or Grushey's recommendation, the "toad in a hole" French toast ($9).

"People want things simply done," he says. "They want to come in and relax. They don't want people breaking quail eggs over their breakfast." But another round of pig in a glass may be in order.

Question for Three Top Chefs

What did you serve at your wedding?

ANDY HUSBANDS: CHEF/OWNER, TREMONT 647
We did barbecue, very similar to the way we do it at Tremont 647. There were ribs, slow-roasted striper, cornbread with all the fixings and a lot more. We just wanted to keep it casual and light for everyone.

JODY ADAMS: CHEF/OWNER, RIALTO
We started with sushi rolls and then went to a monkfish stew with root vegetables. There was also a big salad course with fruit, and a friend of ours made a chocolate cake with raspberry filling, which turned out to be kind of funny because they forgot to strain out the seeds.

CHRIS DOUGLASS: CHEF/OWNER, ICARUS AND ASHMONT GRILL
We were down on the Vineyard with a real small group of people. We did oysters, grilled tuna niçoise, some lobster salad… It was mid-July, so we went down to the farmers' market and grabbed some fresh vegetables and antipasti, and then finished things off with raspberry tarts.

"Fusion, over a period, will lead us to a global cuisine because everyone is traveling. I can't [just] serve sashimi and get away with it."
CHEF RANVEER BRAR

HIGH INTEREST

Located in the old Penny Saving building, Banq brings a new vibe to Washington Street. The South End venue underwent 10 months of renovations before its Feb. 11 opening, having been abandoned by the archdiocese and left to crumble. Says general manager Michael Murphy, workers "had to go down to the substructures and dig their way out."

The result is a cave-like interior. Undulating boards of old-forest birch hang from the ceiling, converging to veil a wine cellar in the center of a 160-seat dining room. Reminiscent of a banyan tree, the stalactic dips, taupe and emerald hues, and spotlit tables give Banq the feel of an oasis reached by spelunking. "We were going for less of an [environmental] impact," Murphy explains. "'Green' is the term of the year."

The term "fusion" is very yesterday, and the Banq team is careful to tiptoe around it. "We kept the menu bordering unusual and close to interesting," says chef Ranveer Brar. "Boston diners have well-exposed palettes, so you cannot get away with doing unorthodox bad food."

Brar's cuisine is French with Southeast Asian influences. Dishes aim for a clean, distinguishable marriage of flavors. Exemplars of the style include appetizers like the veal and basmati croquette mimolette with quince jam ($11) and entrees like Côtes du Rhône–braised short ribs with Japanese yams, caraway scallions and kaffir lime jus ($21). Simple ingredients new to the region appear throughout: banana flower, pok choy, lotus. "We wanted to be educating," he explains. "We're defining 'unusual' for ourselves."

Banq's bar offers a spot for experimentation, too. Featuring wine by the glass ($7–$16) and cocktails like the tamarind margarita ($9), the 35-seat area is an opportune space to sample "amuses" like the soy-ginger lamb spring roll with a Roquefort glaze ($5.50). "We try to keep it separate yet blended," Brar says. "We put things on the plate so you can distinguish them with your palette."

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

erfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION
The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE
The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY
The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD
The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL
The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING
While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT
The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING
The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL
A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

I Get a Kick out of You

Same tux, different day. The best-man gig is growing old. You have to plan the epic bachelor party, and all you get for your trouble is a piddling money clip? This isn't your grandfather's wedding, so why should the groom give outdated gifts? This time around, we're axing the cuff links and ties for something a little different: a pair of customized Nike Dunk Low Premium iD sneakers ($110; nikeid.nike.com). Because nothing says, "Hey man, thanks for bailing me out of jail down in Tijuana" better than a dose of creativity. The best man might get the sneaker with the navy base and the forest green swoosh with the name "Broski" on the right side, while the other groomsmen sport a red base, royal blue swoosh and a big fat "Wingman." The possibilities are endless, which will make them more than dust collectors on the mantle following the main event.

MIKE MICCOLI

REAL ESTATE TOP HONORS

We know the Hancock (60 stories) and the Pru (52) are Boston's two tallest buildings, but which local residences boast the highest rises and the coolest views?

Devonshire Boston
42 stories
Built in 1983, the Devonshire is the tallest apartment building in town. The top two floors house a state-of-the-art gym where residents take in views of downtown Boston while making use of a ridiculous roster of amenities, including a 20x40 heated pool, massage and spa treatments, a controlled-environment solarium and a billiards room.

Boston Harbor Towers I & II
40 stories each
Overlooking, unsurprisingly, Boston Harbor, the towers feature 624 condos and a heated swimming pool. Harbor I is technically the city's second-tallest—standing four feet taller than its counterpart—but we'll still group them together; Tower II can be a serious prima donna.

Ritz-Carlton Towers
38 and 40 stories
The towers hold more than 300 condos combined, but the one Bostonians are most interested in is the 37th-floor, 4,500-square-foot penthouse that Manny Ramirez and family call home. The top floors at the Ritz feature unobstructed views of, well, pretty much everything, including the Public Garden, Boston Common, the Charles, the Back Bay and the Waterfront.

Beauty

Maybe It's Eyelash Extensions

I love mascara. Not the black goop itself, but the illusion it creates. So it seemed about time I give extensions a try. I didn't have to go far, with LuxLash having set up shop at Salon Mario Russo on Newbury (a Natick Collection location is in the works). Around 120 lightweight synthetic lashes (or mink lashes, if you prefer) are applied one by one in four tiers, like shark teeth, with lengths spanning from eight to 15 mm and shapes from C to J curls. The whole process takes an hour and a half. Afterward, the lashes feel light and clump-free. Best of all, they look completely real. Maybelline may be a lot cheaper (a full set of falsies costs $395; refills, $100), but I haven't touched a wand in weeks.

CELTIC ENCOUNTER

YOU WERE THE BRUNETTE with the great smile sitting in Section 18, Row E, Seat 6 at the Celtics game on Feb. 10. We shared our thoughts about the high price of coffee at the Garden and Fenway while my friend made a beer run. I'd love to take you to another game or out for a cup. You and your friend left towards the end of the game, and I haven't been able to think about anything but your great smile since. Shoot me an e-mail—the ball's in your court! (I was the guy in the green Garnett shirt.)

Longwoodfrenchroast@hotmail.com

On a Saturday afternoon you approached me while I was sitting down in a mall:

You were from Ireland and here on business for a certain amount of time. That day I had a lot on my mind so I brushed you off. By the time I came to my senses you were gone, and I never got the opportunity to apologize. If you see this and want to get together, e-mail me.

d2001nu@gmail.com

To the girl in the blue coat who catches the train at Brookline Village around 8 o'clock every morning:

You are obnoxious. Your parents did not teach you any manners whatsoever. I want to slap you in the face every time I see you, and I'm a nice person with manners who rarely considers these types of things. If you know what's good for you, you'll stop pushing everyone to get on the damned train. If the rest of us have to wait in the cold for the next one, then so do you, toots. Here's an idea: Try getting up earlier. Take it from someone who knows that good things come to those who wait—like an empty train.

Two months ago, the Improper staff put our New Year's resolutions in print. We'd now like to report that we were as good as our word: that we shed the excess pounds, spurned the tobacco, and otherwise bettered ourselves through force of will and the indomitable power of clean living.

But we can't. The whole thing was a fiasco—a testament to degeneracy and self-delusion. To wit:

Amanda, who pledged to keep her desk tidy, remains an avowed slob.

Andrew promised to lose 10 pounds, but actually gained weight.

Katie, who swore to blow-dry her hair in the mornings, caught a cold from leaving the house with a wet scalp.

Nick not only failed to crack the spine of Moby Dick, he's stuck somewhere around page 300 of Anna Karenina.

Rich continues to indulge in the unclean habit of dipping.

The one exception to this pathetic litany of failure was our editor, Megan, who worked on her memoir on most Sundays as promised. Congratulations, Megan. You win a well-deserved sense of accomplishment. As for the rest of us? All we can say is, "To thine own self be true," even if that self turns out to be a fat, tobacco-stained, illiterate oaf. And anyway, promises are made to be broken.

Art and Soul

KYRA IS AN ARCHITECT in Cambridge and Andreas is a theater director staging the opera Tosca in Carol Gilligan's new novel. Both are striding the heavens of idealistic and high-toned art. They're also emotionally wounded, having lost their respective mates to politically tinged violence. Kyra's professional preoccupation, its spirit and ideology, is to "change the structure of people's inner lives by changing the outer structures as well," and this fluid and flowing intent has her designing a community on Nashawena Island near Martha's Vineyard. The building steam in the pair's romance is appealingly gradual, held back by continuing grief and attachment, but they make contact through their two rarified talents. When Andreas abruptly abandons Kyra she reacts painfully, even cutting herself. She takes her distress to a therapist, Greta, with whom she develops a great bond, and comes to wonder whether Greta's own appreciation of her is merely professional, bound by therapy's rules and walls, or whether, as in her Nashawena landscape, it is more open, more real. Love, art and therapy interconnect fascinatingly in this novel.

Kyra is by psychologist Carol Gilligan, formerly of Harvard and best known for her nonfiction book In a Different Voice.

SHOWING WOOD Planks for nothing!

Utterly Board

THE RICH AESTHETIC resonance that comes from the wood at Cambridge's Longleaf Lumber, reclaimed from old barns, buildings and beams, makes ordinary flooring look flavorless. The well-named heart pine or yummy pumpkin pine boards, among others, bring their history to your feet. In their often deep color, the textures of their grain and their beautiful scars from life, their surfaces are peppered with features like "mortise pockets" and adze marks, or spots where nails were yanked out. Longleaf has remilled this wood so you can bring antique gravitas to your floors when remodeling or constructing from scratch. Another piece of the gnarled forest come indoors is the live oak with its grandfatherly enormity. Here it's sliced to make end tables, a seat or a stand to hold a large plant; the piece may be tipped to reveal the beautiful whorls of the tree's life cycle. They also sell bamboo and cork, which is lighter in shade and bouncier in texture. Added bonus: cork insulates, both thermally and acoustically.

Longleaf Lumber (115 Fawcett St., Cambridge; 617-871-6611; longleaflumber.com) sells remilled boards for floors and other construction.

Sweet! If South Enders had any doubts as to the profession of the newcomer at 83 Pembroke, proprietress Lee Napoli's whimsical window display paints a pretty clear picture. The jumbo whisks dangling from the ceiling above metal mixing bowls look so real, they even fooled the health inspector. Opened last month, ChocoLee Chocolates is the latest addition to the neighborhood's impossibly long list of epicurean bragging rights. Inside, you'll find fresh-dipped truffles in flavors including espresso, hazelnut, chocolate mint, Grand Marnier and poblano chili. Napoli, formerly a pastry chef at several local restaurants, plans to stock the shop's pink-tiled case with even more mellifluous confections. But don't wait. The runny salted caramels are reason enough to head over. ELIZABETH BOMZE

TODAY'S RENE

Michelena steps up to a new plate.

TEN YEARS AFTER arriving in Boston, he's earned a reputation as culinary catalyst par excellence, opening and/or running the kitchens of such notable eateries as La Bettola, Centro, the Vault, Saint Nitery and, most recently, Domani Bar & Trattoria.

Chef Rene Michelena

Now, Rene Michelena has teamed up with the Cronin Group and managing partner Tim Collins to serve as executive chef for a major new project in the Financial District: a four-story restaurant and lounge topped with an enclosable roofdeck. The restaurant, Central 37 at 21 Broad St., adjoins the Water Street lounge, Market. Upscale and large-scale, encompassing intimate dining areas, an elegant circular bar and an up-to-the-minute sound system, the space is the biggest yet to showcase Michelena's wide-ranging, Asian- and Italian-influenced cuisine.

At Market (aka Mkt), the "world tasting menu" is divided into two sections at dinner: Chilled, which includes lobster salad with radish, pineapple, watermelon, lemon aioli and mizuna greens with pickled ginger juice; and Hot, which includes smoked salmon arepas, fried veal and leek dumplings, and a Moroccan-spiced moulard duck burger. At Central 37, from food billed as "urban American," diners might start with grilled brined squab with scallion pancakes and cucumber slaw, move on to oxtail cannelloni with red onion marmalade and celery broth, then finish with the too-rarely-seen "classic opera cake"—layers of dacquoise, ganache and coffee cutter cream. All this, plus the usual suspects: a solid wine list and more than a few signature cocktails. Whether you think of it as "world tasting," "urban American" or simply "Rene Michelena's new place," you'll want to think about checking it out soon.

HIGH AND MIGHTY

Take the heat and get into this kitchen.

IN EARLY REPORTS, chef/owner Mark Romano styled his new venture a "gastro-pub, Somerville-style." To me, the ambiance says pub. The food, fortunately, says bistro. Whatever it is, Highland Kitchen—on the avenue of the same name—is the sort of joint every neighborhood should have. Locals and savvy out-of-towners frequent Highland for drinks or an affordable dinner in a convivial atmosphere. They know to arrive early, especially on nights when seats are at a premium or during brunch when live country music replaces the jukebox tunes.

Not for the faint of heart, many of Romano's spiced creations reflect the Southern and Caribbean themes explored at his earlier venues—East Coast Grill, Blue Room and, most recently, Green Street Grill—but the menu keeps less-adventurous palates in mind, too. Attentive, well-informed and friendly waitstaff protect heat-averse patrons from venturing into the more mouth-blistering preparations like the curried goat stew ($16.95).

Nostalgic for New Orleans, I leapt at the chance to satisfy my craving for Cajun or Creole fare with Highland's seafood gumbo ($4). A thick and flavorful creation redolent of garlic, onions, bell peppers, tomatoes and herbs (including a touch of cayenne), it was thickened and seasoned with okra and file powder (ground sassafras leaves). A cup's worth contained a huge, perfectly textured shrimp and a delicious slice of andouille sausage. A pair of robust, tasty smoked bluefish cakes ($8.95) came with an even stronger mango-mustard sauce that stood up well to the rich, oily fish. Romesco sauce, a Catalonian condiment made from tomatoes, peppers, nuts, olive oil, vinegar, bread and garlic, dressed an order of roasted garlic shrimp ($8.95), emphasis on the garlic.

We finished off our appetizer selections with mussels steamed in lobster broth ($7.95) and fried calamari ($6.95). The large bowl of plump, clean mussels came in a delectable broth containing tomatoes and spicy-salty chorizo, which I couldn't resist polishing off with a spoon after the shellfish was gone. The calamari combined tender ringlets and crunchy tentacles with ultrathin slices of piquant red and green peppers. They arrived hot and fresh—our waitress seemed almost to run from the kitchen in order to serve them as such. An accompaniment of smoky roasted-tomato dipping sauce added a pleasing, cooling counterpoint.

Main courses sustained the high standards, and the sauces that graced many of them made the fresh slices of Iggy's French loaves indispensable. Braised pork shoulder ($16.95) balanced the more provocatively spiced appetizers. Its flavorful, fall-off-the-bone meat came with a garnish of creamy polenta and sautéed collard greens and onions. Crisp skin covered the juicy flesh of a roasted boneless half chicken ($15.95), flanked by garlicky mashed potatoes and pleasantly bitter sautéed Swiss chard. A flat-iron steak ($16.95) boasted rich beef flavor and coarse but tender texture. Accompanied by a well-turned Bordelaise sauce, exquisitely sweet grilled red onions and hot, fresh french fries, this bargain-priced steak would have satisfied the most carnivorous of patrons. Last, but certainly not least, a "Cuban Reuben" sandwich with shards of roast pork, corned beef and Swiss cheese layered with sauerkraut (here called "pickled cabbage") was almost worth the trip by itself.

2005 Gatekeeper Shiraz

Desserts, all $6, included a crunchy, crumbly cinnamon–apple crisp pastry and a small cylinder of chocolate cake, which was a tad dry but accompanied by a killer scoop of intensely chocolate ice cream. For wine, the one bargain standout was the 2005 Gatekeeper Shiraz from South Australia, a fruity quaff that went well with the spicy food. A range of draft beers (from $3 to $6 a pint) and an extravagant array of cocktails enhanced the "pub, Somerville-style" credentials of this eatery.

Highland occupies a building that appears nondescript from the outside, but is cozy and well-appointed with plenty of dark wood, exposed red and painted white bricks, comfortable banquettes and booths, and a long, inviting bar that seats about 15. Wrought-iron light fixtures alternate with plain, purely functional ones. A focal point in this compact space is the jukebox, with bright CD covers featuring a who's who of musical Americana. Call it what you want: This is one fun, enjoyable kitchen. ✖✖✖

ENTER SANDMAN

It's been a while since I've hung out with Abe Lincoln and the beaver.

I'M GOOD AT SLEEPING. If I tell you to let me sleep on it, you know you're not getting an answer for at least eight hours, possibly nine or 10. I love naps. My bed is a meticulously crafted cocoon of coziness—pillow-top mattress, mattress pad, featherbed, jersey sheets with down comforter and pillows. If sleeping were a contest on American Gladiators, I would beat Wolf so decisively that he would consequently embark on a metaphor about hunger in which he represents himself as an anthropomorphic feral canine while commiserating with Hulk Hogan.

But as I write this, I sit here bleary-eyed and groggy, because for the past week, I've taken an involuntary trip into the world of insomnia. Last night I was up until 4 am, struggling with the accumulated effects of jet lag, a brutal schedule and a cold. It's a vicious cycle—you get overtired, you get sick and then you can't sleep, which means your immune system stays depressed and you're awake all night coughing and listening to the gunshots outside.

Yes, gunshots. That's just one of the fun things I've learned about insomnia—being awake at the wee hours gives you insight into your neighborhood that you probably wished you didn't have. And the other night, as I sat on the couch at 2 am, reading and hoping to feel the familiar pull toward the land of Nod, I was instead startled by the sharp report of seven or eight gunshots, coming from the direction of the Waterfront. I'm not sure what's more disturbing, the fact that someone was bustin' caps in Southie that close to my apartment, or that there was absolutely nothing about it in the paper the next day. The prospect of stray bullets zinging through the window did nothing to ease me off to slumber.

That's another maddening aspect of a sleepless night—the longer you're awake, the more worries and strange obsessions your idle brain creates to keep you awake. For example, the other day I got two random phone calls from the 518 area code. There was no message. When I did a reverse lookup of the number, I discovered it belonged to an establishment in upstate New York known as Harry's Honey Hut. Further research revealed that Harry's Honey Hut was not, in fact, a strip club as I'd assumed, but an actual honey retailer. But why was Harry calling me? Was there some type of imminent honey-related emergency that I needed to know about, if only I'd answer the phone? There were so many possibilities, all of them bad. Maybe Harry was making a delivery in my area, his truck overturned and a swarm of African killer bees escaped and were right now building a hive in my basement. Maybe the honey on my shelf, which may or may not have come from Harry's Hut, was tainted by hydrazine leaked from the damaged spy satellite that might come crashing through the roof at any second. Would it kill you to leave a message, Harry? Would it?

The longer you're awake, the more worries your idle brain creates.

Here's another strange event that gave my brain some sleep-repelling obsession fodder: A couple nights ago I was letting my dog out, and as I stepped out the door, I encountered a guy walking in my direction, carrying a plastic bucket. I tend to prematurely react to the other person on the sidewalk, which results in the uncomfortable impasse where you're face-to-face with a stranger, both of you mumbling "excuse me" and mirroring the other's efforts to get out of the way. This time, not only was I unsuccessfully juking left and right to avoid this guy, but my dog, trying to follow my lead, didn't know what the hell to do either, with the consequence that all three of us ended up bunched in a tight cluster, face to face, on the otherwise deserted sidewalk. In the awkward pause that ensued, this fellow blurted, "Want some fish chowder?" and proffered me his pail. I expressed thanks but declined this surprising offer, which prompted him to follow up with, "It's fresh!" Now I felt bad, the implication being that my refusal of the gift chowder indicated suspicion on my part as to the chowder's fresh deliciousness. But what was I supposed to do, take the entire pail? Scoop up some chowder in my hands? The logistics of this deal just didn't make sense.

Eventually we extricated ourselves, he went on his way with his bucket and I went inside to lie awake, wondering if I'd offended this man and should've taken some chowder. Maybe I just missed out on the best chowder I'd ever taste, along with a great story about how that chowder came from a random guy on the street. I imagined the chamber of commerce designing a new slogan: "Boston: If a stranger on the street hasn't offered you chowder yet, just wait."

I think maybe my problem is that I'm so accustomed to easy sleep that I don't know how to consciously calm myself down at bedtime. Maybe tonight I'll try counting sheep. Although, based on the recent history of my sleep-deprived brain, I won't be surprised if the third sheep over the fence turns around, points a gun at me and demands I try some honey and chowder. ✖✖✖

MARRIAGE FOR DUMMIES

Mishaps and missteps on the way to wedded bliss

I KNOW IT'S TIME FOR BRIDES, and their families, to start spending money on spring weddings. Still, I'm going to share some cautionary tales and thoughts about the nuptial process. Every man I've ever asked about the marriage ceremony has basically revealed, "It was a blur, an out-of-body experience, a mumbling of words without any thought of their meaning." And honestly, how can you know at an early age what "for richer or poorer, in sickness or in health" might mean? (Not to mention "forsaking all others.") Those vows certainly don't hold up for the 50 percent of American marriages that end in divorce. The other half soldier on, learning the real truth of another phrase: "That which doesn't kill us, makes us stronger."

Such statistics might explain why people get sick of attending weddings over time. A sardonic friend told me, "I've hated going for years, ever since I got married. It's all the fantasy thing. I can't chase the bridesmaids anymore, so.... It's as bad as being a consultant. You're not really in the game." I once went to a wedding at Quincy Market on the second floor of the main building. Strangers walked up the stairs and into the reception. The bride came at the intruders, beating them over the head with her bouquet. "Doesn't look good for the groom's future," my wife said to me. She was right. He'd be lucky if all he was pummeled with were flowers.

No one ever tells me stories about what a beautiful wedding they attended. It's great when they describe it as "memorable." I suppose it says volumes about the kind of people with whom I associate. Just this morning, a blues musician called and told me that he played a fancy affair in Nantucket where all the bridesmaids mooned the band. "And they all wore identical thongs," he added. Another friend was an usher at a wedding on a small island off Seattle. "The bride told me," he recounted, "that right before the wedding, her father took her for a walk in their lovely formal gardens. 'Here's my advice,' the father said. 'The wedding's three hours away. But I want you to know that you do not have to marry this asshole.'" She did anyway, and it did end in a split. Another tale like this involved a huge reception at the Plaza in New York celebrating the merger of two powerful families. The couple finally fled the gathering with the society band pounding out "We Are Family." Settled in the back of the limo, the bride looked at her husband and said, "I think I've made a horrible mistake." Turned out she was right.

Six of my 10 ushers have been married to their original wives for many years. If I could generalize about the main reason for this longevity, I'd say mutual intellectual curiosity. They grew together, with strong interests in wide-ranging subjects: from politics to travel, from sailing to books of all kinds. They've inspired each other with shared ideas that have kept them stimulated and, most of the time, surprised by one another. The marriages that have gotten into trouble, in my opinion, are those where one person's interests and growth diverged, and the original reasons for the union became irrelevant and stale. I've had no friends, thank goodness, who were cruel and abusive, so I tend to parcel out equal blame for the relationships that haven't worked.

And again, what do you know when you're young? Our best man brought us a wrought-iron lantern from Bogotá, Colombia, as an early wedding gift. Later, we served as ushers at another wedding, attending what seemed to be the classic Episcopalian drunken pre-ceremony lunch. He threw down a few Bloodys and told me, "I stole that lantern I gave you from some restaurant." In the church, the two of us shared the assignment of rolling out the runner for the bride. Being mechanically challenged, nearsighted and half in the bag from lunch, I walked with him to the front of the hushed church, silent except for the organist playing a single long note. With all eyes on us, the minister waiting, we bent down to pick up the tabs on the runner. Except I couldn't see any tabs. My friend found his, as people in the pews began to mutter. The mother of the bride glared at me. So I picked up one end and began to march to the back. After three steps we could hear the runner tearing as the mother of the bride called to her husband, "For God's sake, do something." The assembled, under God, burst into laughter. The groom swore he'd get even with me when it came time for my own wedding, but he was too much the gentleman when that moment arrived. I still worry about what he's really planning. "Revenge for wedding pranks is a dish best eaten cold." ✖✖✖

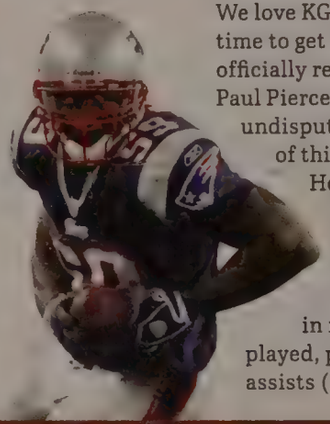
3 Notes on the Offseason From Hell

Roll Up Pass... We're all dealing with the Super Bowl loss in our own little ways, so if Kevin Faulk feels the need to cope by getting stoned at a Lil Wayne concert, that's cool. It was probably medicinal, anyway. That injured leg isn't going to heal itself.

Remember the Times... The releases of Eugene Wilson and Rosie Colvin are the first of what will probably be a decent number of goodbyes Pats fans will have to say over the next couple months. It's starting to feel like the last scene in Ocean's Eleven. We had a bunch of guys who were part of something truly great, but now, one by one, they're walking off into the crowd and trying to pretend that none of it ever happened.

Pay Him in Straight Cash, Homey... So it looks like one guy who will be back is Randy Moss, which is great because we actually heard a pained scream (sort of like a yak in heat) from Brady's Back Bay penthouse when they didn't franchise Moss last month. Have we seen Moss' best year as a Patriot? Probably, but at least it's one bit of good news from Foxborough.



4 DATES TO WATCH

3/5 Pistons at Celtics. If Detroit and Boston finish with identical records, the winner of tonight's showdown will own home court throughout the playoffs. When you think about it that way, this game might end up deciding who represents the East in the Finals.

3/10 The oldest member of the Red Sox, Mike Timlin, turns 42. Oldest, that is, until a slew of injuries in the infield leads to the surprise activation of Johnny Pesky.

3/16 It's the NCAA tournament selection show; here's your foolproof routine for the ensuing workweek. Monday: Intermittent coughing. Tuesday: Loudly begin saying phrases like, "Jesus, I just can't kick this thing." Wednesday: Induce vomiting through finger manipulation or self-poisoning. Vomit everywhere; make a scene. Thursday and Friday: Watch hoops from the couch.

3/17 The Sox and Yankees clash for the first time this season! (We should probably mention that this one takes place in Tampa at 1 pm on a Monday afternoon, and that the starters won't play, and that the game means absolutely nothing. But it sounds better the other way.)

TOP 5 NBA FAVORITES

Lakers
What do you get when you take the best player in the NBA and surround him with two seven-foot stars, a 6-10 point forward and maybe the greatest coach in league history? The biggest threat to the Celtics' championship dreams. Rumor has it Jack Nicholson's sworn off Viagra; instead he's leaving a copy of the Lakers' upgraded roster on his bedside table.

Celtics
We love KG, but it's time to get real and officially recognize Paul Pierce as the undisputed MVP of this team. He hasn't missed a game and leads the C's in minutes played, points and assists (he's also second in rebounding and three-pointers). At the start of the season there was a lot of debate over who would take the last shot in close games. Nowadays the answer is clear: Brian Scalabrine. But if he's out, definitely Pierce.

Spurs
They could maybe be No. 1 here, but we hate Manu Ginobili far too much to be unbiased. It's a travesty he even has the word Gino in his name. How dare he sully the name of the crown prince/coke fiend of Celtics Nation.

Pistons
How solid has Rasheed Wallace been this year? He's been more good than crazy... and Rasheed's a whole lot of crazy. And a team that has Chauncey Billups running the show in crunch time is always a threat to win it all. Thanks again, coach Pitino!

Phoenix
The Suns probably have to be in the discussion here, with two legit superstars (Nash and Amare) and a decent bench, but with Shaq working the lane with the agility of a handicapped elephant, can we really take them seriously?

2 RANDOM CRITICISMS

1. Fried With Love... There is no more universally loved stadium snack than chicken tenders over fries. So why are they so hard to find at TD Banknorth Garden? Why do we have to wade through hot dog nuts and Italian eateries when all any one wants is tenders? They should be sold at every stand. Even the ice cream parlor.

2. We Really Think So... The more we read about the Sox trip to Japan, the less sense it makes. Do you realize that after playing two "real" games, they come back and play three more spring training games? Or that the team leaves March 20 and won't be back in Boston until April 7? How are you going to successfully start a season on a three-week intercontinental road trip?

ONE KIND REQUEST

OK, TV folks. All we want is a quick disclaimer. Just one little graphic. Have it say: "Attention, Patriots fans. We're about to run the new Giants Gatorade commercial. You have three seconds to change the channel, blind yourself with mace or whatever else feels right. Things will get better. We promise. Just keep your heads up."

"There were so many cute boys at Harvard. I should've just married one and dragged him out to L.A. with me."

Soroff On BITSIE TULLOCH

The Quarterlife star on her interesting name, Internet TV and eating like a horse

ACTRESS BITSIE TULLOCH WAS RAISED in Spain, Uruguay and Argentina before returning to the United States to attend high school in Pound Ridge, N.Y. Tulloch, 27, graduated magna cum laude from Harvard with a double major in English and American literature and visual and environmental studies. After moving to Los Angeles she began her acting career with a play called Quarterlife, and in 2007 she had the recurring role of Alex in the Internet series Lonelygirl15. She has appeared on Cold Case, The West Wing, Moonlight and as R2-D2's girlfriend in George Lucas' mockumentary about the Star Wars robot. Currently, she plays the lead role in Quarterlife (no relation to the play), which began as an online series but has been picked up by NBC. Her movie credits include the forthcoming Lakeview Terrace and Vacuuming the Cat, and she is currently working on a feature film entitled Tyranny. She lives in L.A.

Jonathan Soroff: First of all, let's discuss the name Bitsie.
Bitsie Tulloch: My first name is Elizabeth, and Bitsie was my grandfather's childhood nickname. For some reason when I was born, people started calling me Bitsie, too.

Is it a liability?
No, it's served me well, because it's not a name that people tend to forget. It's also not really indicative of my personality. The one other Bitsie I've met was very posh and New Canaan, Conn., which is not me.

So you don't dot your i's with hearts or flowers?
No. I actually never did, and I never really liked the girls who did that.

You grew up overseas mostly. Did that make you feel more American or less?
When we finally moved to America, my sister and I were kind of like, "Why are these kids so bratty?" The environment we were raised in, very Latin cultures, kids didn't talk back to their parents. Children were very respectful and well-behaved, and my mom was pretty strict to begin with. So it was weird when we got here. Technically I lived in New York longer than anywhere, but I've never spent more than four or five years in one place.

The Lampoon recently honored Paris Hilton, who said, "Harvard is hot." Agree?
I think Harvard is very hot. I say this all the time, because I'm always bemoaning my singledom, and I tell my friends, "There were so many cute boys at Harvard. I should've just married one and dragged him out to L.A. with me." I didn't realize there would be such slim pickings in Los Angeles.

Who from Harvard do you hang out with in Los Angeles?
It's sort of funny. Two months ago I switched agencies, and one of my friends from Harvard works at William Morris. He's not an agent yet, but he was very instrumental in getting me over there. But in general, most of my college friends are back east, which kind of sucks.

Lonelygirl15 was really ground-breaking. Did you know then that you were doing something totally unprecedented?
Yeah, because by the time I started shooting, it had already been airing for nine months, so people knew that it was fake. It should also be noted that it was Marshall [Herskovitz, cocreator of Quarterlife with Ed Zwick] who discovered me, because I shot the pilot for Quarterlife months before I started Lonelygirl.

How is it different doing something for the Web versus TV or film?
Well, acting is acting. But pretty much on every level of production, from the top to the talent to the writers, the production values in TV or film are higher. Lonelygirl was very fun. The episodes were two minutes long, so you could shoot two in a day, but the cool thing about working on an Internet series is that I was only hired to do five episodes and the fans loved my character, so they wrote in to the creators saying, "Bring her back," and I ended up doing 15.

Is the Internet the future of TV and movies?
I don't think it's the future anymore. They're already hand in hand. Half of what's happening on TV is also happening on the Internet, and now Quarterlife is moving from the Internet to a TV network. People are really starting to pay attention to the Internet as a viable platform.

Isn't that what the writer's strike was about?
I've been very supportive and sympathetic to the Writers Guild, and the Screen Actors Guild is possibly going to be striking over the same issues in June unless it can be resolved before then. Another thing about Quarterlife is that Marshall and Ed did this by themselves because they were so frustrated with networks having so much power.

You look really thin. Are you eating well?
I am! I'm just really skinny. Some fan wrote that they were concerned, but I've always been this way. My mom weighs, like, 90 pounds. Of course, the downside to that is that I'm not exactly voluptuous. So as nice as it is to be able to eat whatever I want, I sometimes look longingly at dresses and think, "I'll never be able to fill that out."

I'm not sure I believe you.
Seriously, I eat like a pig. In between takes, I eat all the prop food. Any of the guys will tell you I eat like a horse and piss off the prop masters.

Which is better for sex: animate or inanimate objects?
Do men count as objects? If so, I'm going to have to say animate.

So in Hollywood, you're getting treated like the Next Big Thing...
I don't know that I'd go that far. There is a lot of pressure. New York magazine did a thing like, "Bitsie Tulloch's Bent on World Domination" or something, and I was like, "Oh, shit. That's a lot of pressure." But who knows? Next week I'm flying to New York to do The Today Show, The View, MTV's TRL and all that, but right now I'm just trying to concentrate on the work.

What's your biggest concession to living in L.A.?
I flew out here the day after I graduated from Harvard, and I was coming off of eight years of pretty intense academia, so it was a bit of a culture shock. It's harder to find people who read books out here. When I talk about reading, they assume I mean a script. I tend to glom onto anyone here who reads books.

Last question: When do we get to see you in a nude scene?
I don't know. I just passed on something recently. I'd only do it for a really good script, with a really good director, in a scene that absolutely required it. Otherwise, I doubt I'd do it. Sorry. ✖✖✖

THE WEDDING PLANNER

How to bring your personal style to the altar

By Marni Elyse Katz Photographs by David Bradley

Don't let the movies fool you. It's possible to get hitched without enlisting Tiffany & Co. and Vera Wang (though we like them plenty). The real challenge is sorting through the endless choices that the wedding industry tosses at you like rice. Such variety can seem overwhelming.

To help with your planning, we've put forth six styles: beach, budget, green, hipster, preppy and traditional. For each, you'll find our picks for the perfect outfit, site, cake, bouquet, invite, ring, song and honeymoon. Whether you're a classic Tiffany and Vera bride or an indie princess in a short champagne dress and peep-toe heels, we've got you covered.

BEACH

Your engagement ring looks as blue as the sea, and that's where you plan to tie the knot. With a shell-scattered cake and a breezy bouquet, your windswept look works well with the rugged landscape of the North Shore.

Sports Chick

Julie Donaldson plays ball in Boston.

BY ANDREW RIMAS PHOTOGRAPH BY ROBERT ADAMO

Bostonians will forgive Julie Donaldson her beauty. As the newest sports reporter for WHDH Channel 7, Donaldson has a face that could stop a thousand remote controls in mid-flip. But even on television, looks aren't everything. Fans here expect their chattering heads to be scholars, even pathological obsessives. They want them to know baseball statistics that would leave regular mortals wiping the cranial fluid from their ears.

"I'm not going to know the exact lineup of a team from 20 years ago," says Donaldson, a former Miss Florida USA. "What I have to do is understand the histories, what makes the teams what they are today." She flashes a smile of lucent, Botticelli pearl. "So I ask a lot of questions."

Julie Donaldson is one of those oddities of the American media—a "chick in sports," as she puts it, an orchid sprouting out of a pot of knobby cacti. Still, the usual tropes about female empowerment, about intrepid women braving the boys' winks and bottom-slaps and storming the broadcasting world, are just that: tropes. There are a lot of chicks in sports today. But not all of them are as self-aware as Donaldson. For instance, she feels no shame in using the word "peroxide."

"In beauty pageants, you learn that you're going to be judged, and that things are subjective," she says. "You learn that at the end of the day, no matter what happens, it's going to be OK." This may not be a prescription for monkish serenity, exactly, but it's a worthy sentiment, particularly from someone whose job is to make us care about millionaires playing with balls.

As the middle of three sisters growing up in Jacksonville, Donaldson was a tomboy of the type who wanted not only to outrace the boys on bicycles, but to beat them at arm wrestling, too. Femininity was thrust upon her when her mother enrolled her in high school beauty pageants. "I just kept winning," she says, almost embarrassed. "I love competing, and I love talking, and I can walk and talk on a stage." Pageant judges liked her honesty, too. Instead of pledging herself to founding leper colonies and solving the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, she admitted that she really wanted a Mercedes.

Pageantry gave Donaldson a taste for the camera. Rejecting entertainment as too intrusive and news as too somber, she earned her television spurs on FOX Sports Net and the Miami Heat's Heat TV. One of her first baseball assignments was covering Mike Lowell as a Marlin. For the segment, he threw her a ball, and to the amazement of everyone on the field she hit a line-drive straight at him. Later, he scored a home run with the same bat, which she now keeps, totem-like, in her apartment. "I'm a single woman," she laughs. "It's protection."

Despite Miami's sun and dazzle and the quick hop to her family home, Donaldson wasn't ready to settle. In 2006 she left the Heat for the hard-boiled market of SportsNet New York. "People in New York grow up being fans for generations, so it was tough. They're very knowledgeable." And while she had the chance to cover big stories including the Mets clinching their division in 2006, the limelight had its dangers. "Jose Reyes and about six other players came up spraying me with champagne and beer. I got champagne in my eyes. It's very uncomfortable. A sticky, burning sensation."

Last month Donaldson accepted an offer from Channel 7 to dive headfirst into the most rabid sports market in the country. "I've had people tell me that life is different here than in New York," she says. "In New York, people don't look twice at Charlize Theron walking down the street. I've been warned about the media here."

And rightfully so. This article is the first of many that will introduce her to the hungry crowd and that will try to reveal some telling, even intimate, detail about her personal life. Like the fact that she wears pink kickboxing gloves. But what her viewers really care about is how she covers the game. Her first assignment for Channel 7, even before she had a chance to fill out her payroll forms, was to go home to Florida for spring training. It was a strangely gentle beginning, less a trial by fire than by an ocean breeze.

"Josh Beckett gave me some advice while I was down there," she says. "He told me that while people get really immersed in the statistics and the sport, in the end it's a game." Again, the jeweled smile. "It's about having fun." ✖✖✖

BOHO Rhapsody

Aoife O'Donovan hits all the right fashion notes.

By Amanda Knorr

Aoife O'Donovan receives lots of fan mail. After singing with her alternative bluegrass and string band Crooked Still, O'Donovan's in-box gets flooded with messages complimenting her on two things: her talent and her wardrobe. She holds both in high regard.

"They'll say, 'Where can I get that dress you were wearing on stage?'" explains 25-year-old Aoife (pronounced EE-fuh), whose style icons include Grace Kelly, Michelle Phillips and Kate Bosworth. The Newton native also likes Marc Jacobs, Diane von Furstenburg and Ella Moss (in no particular order) and is a regular at Anthropologie, Barneys New York and Bloomingdale's. But as much as O'Donovan appreciates expensive fashion, she sees the beauty in worn items, too.

Which brings us to her enviable boot collection, a blend of boutique and eBay purchases with several from Frye. They're "so classic and wear so well. They never go out of style," she observes. The more broken-in the better when they're traveling from stage to muddy festival to bar. Still, she recently bought some beautiful Chloés at Intermix. "I'll splurge on one really nice pair of boots and mix them with a medium-end piece," she says.

Similarly, O'Donovan doesn't have one set style, since venues and environments change on the road. "I can glam it up if need be," she says. "Being a musician, you have to pack stuff to sit in the van and you have to pack stuff to wear at the show." She gets most creative with her second band Sometymes Why, an all-girl group. "We have a lot of fun planning our outfits. I'm always inspired by my peers."

A traveling shopper, she should be bringing new pieces back to the Hub once her Crooked Still tour ends this month (their CD releases in June). "Whenever I have a day in a city, I'll try and find a boutique or cool store." In Boston it's Mint Julep, New York it's Roni and Louisville it's Queen of Rags—in case you saw her perform and just had to know. But feel free to send fan mail anyway. ✖✖✖

GAELIC CUISINE

Contrary to stereotypes, Irish cuisine isn't all boiled potatoes, neat whiskey and Lucky Charms. To prove it, on March 14 a band of celebrity chefs from both Ireland and Boston put on a show of stylish, contemporary Irish cooking. Dubbed the Gaelic Gourmet Gala, the evening features demonstrations from bigwig locals like Michael Schlow, Patrick Connolly and Marc Orfaly, as well as from their Hibernian peers. Swap the shamrock shirt for cocktail attire, and forget that corned beef and cabbage ever existed.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Atonement ★★★ Director Joe Wright, who helmed 2005's rollicking, dynamic take on Pride and Prejudice, reteams with Keira Knightley, this time to tackle Ian McEwan's epic WWII downer. The first hour suggests we might be in for a masterpiece, as cinematographer Seamus McGarvey's camera restlessly prowls through the English country estate where Knightley's poor little rich girl pines for James McAvoy's hapless gardener. Class resentments simmer; sexual tensions sizzle; and a few tragic misunderstandings hurtle things headlong into disaster. Then along comes that pesky war, and Christopher Hampton's screenplay switches gears into more abstract, literary territory, and these vibrant flesh-and-blood characters recede into symbols. Wright desperately tries to hold our attention with an array of visual trickery, but even a breathtakingly staged, unbroken steadicam shot, winding its way around thousands of extras at the Dunkirk evacuation, can't touch the close-quartered intimacy of those early reels. The final kicker is a purely literary flourish, one that connects in the head but not the heart. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Charlie Bartlett ★½ A perplexing mashup of Rushmore, Pump up the Volume and any 1980s John Hughes flick, director John Poll's confused ode to overmedicated youth stars the charmless Anton Yelchin as a poor, little rich kid expelled from countless private academies before becoming an extremely unlikely cult hero at a ramshackle public school. At first picked on for wearing a blazer and tie, the pompous lad soon starts holding impromptu bathroom psychotherapy sessions for his troubled classmates, recklessly distributing antidepressants and indulging them in the usual "parents just don't understand" sloganeering. Things take an even stranger turn when the students revolt against security cameras installed by their clueless principal, who, unsurprisingly, turns out to be just as depressed and confused as the kids he's attempting to discipline. The great Robert Downey Jr. works his typical magic with this largely unplayable role, and we share his befuddlement that a squishy, little nonpresence like Yelchin's Bartlett could inspire a mass rebellion. Ferris Bueller, he's not. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Charlie Wilson's War ★★½ It should've been the movie of the year. Begging for pointed satire, the true-life saga of a Texas congressman (Tom Hanks) covertly arming and training the Afghan mujahideen is a ripe example of American victories coming back to bite us on the backside. But working from a sharp and extremely funny script by West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin (here making amends for his odious Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip), director Mike Nichols chickens out by softening all the body-blows with broad comedic flourishes and abruptly pulling the plug before the logical ending. Still, Hanks is a joy to watch as the debauched do-gooder, bantering back and forth with Philip Seymour Hoffman's movie-stealing CIA crank. Wildly miscast as a voracious millionaire man-eater, Julia Roberts does a lousy Susan Sarandon impression. There are enough meaty moments to make the film almost worthwhile, but it's too bad Nichols pulled so many punches. (At Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Cloverfield ★★½ A triumph of gimmickry from huckster JJ Abrams, this savvily constructed bit of stuntwork purports to be camcorder footage found after a devastating attack by a giant lizard, who we can only assume isn't called Godzilla due to copyright restrictions. Basically The Blair Witch Project's dumber, bigger-budget sibling, Cloverfield begins at an insufferable party full of vapid Manhattan 20-somethings, then sends us on a shaky, handheld nightmare through panicked streets after the inane love story is rudely interrupted by the Statue of Liberty's decapitation. If you can forget the hundreds of preposterous logistical quandaries—something that shouldn't be difficult, as the

Will Ferrell tests his range with a sports comedy.

Semi-Pro

HOW LONG IS WILL FERRELL going to get away with making the same movie? The former SNL comic is not an unfunny guy. He's certainly adept at hurling his freakishly tall frame across the screen in all sorts of bizarre contortions and wringing laughs from his peculiar brand of white-guy cluelessness. There's a blankness in Ferrell's eyes, a complete lack of self-awareness that in the right circumstances is undeniably amusing. But does he have anything else to show us?

Ferrell's breakthrough performance as the aging frat boy Frank the Tank in the otherwise unremarkable Old School felt like something of a revelation. His nude, drunken antics weren't just a sharp contrast to his WASPy everyman features; there was also a distinct sadness to the character, a worn, middle-aged disappointment that the movie was too slick and shallow to fully realize. Frank was Bluto Blutarsky after he grew up and moved to the suburbs, and Ferrell made him strangely endearing.

Alas, it seems like the moment actors like Ferrell and Adam Sandler hit the jackpot they transform into one-man franchises that take complete creative control over their projects, often with unfortunate results. Ferrell has become a box office juggernaut, but his starring vehicles are becoming as slapdash and indistinguishable as those from Sandler's Happy Madison production company.

Anchorman, Talladega Nights and even the atrocious Blades of Glory have their fans—and I must confess, I chuckled at the first two—but none of these flicks can really stand as actual, honest-to-goodness movies. Ferrell likes to surround himself with other funny people, and his improv background leads to long, ad-libbed scenes that fly off in unexpected directions. The catch is that he'll sacrifice everything for a laugh. It's a fine mentality for a sketch but becomes tiresome over the course of a feature.

Truly great screen comedy comes from grounding the characters in a recognizable world and playing against the logic and rules of that particular universe. But anything goes in Ferrell's flicks, to the point where Anchorman's DVD offered an entire extra movie stitched together from deleted scenes.

The lone exception, of course, is Jon Favreau's marvelous Christmas comedy Elf, in which Ferrell was laser-focused on an extremely specific character, which served the story instead of Ferrell's own sense of humor. Rumors of bad blood between the actor and director ran rampant, the only confirmation being Favreau's announcement that he will have no involvement in the inevitable Elf 2.

The Will Ferrell comedy machine continues to deliver diminishing returns with this confused and wildly uneven basketball spoof. Surprisingly coarse in its profane and raunchy sexual humor, Semi-Pro aims to be a throwback to those great, lewd sports comedies of the 1970s like Slap Shot and The Longest Yard. It winds up having more in common with the era's roundball misfires, like The Fish That Saved Pittsburgh or Gabe Kaplan's Fast Break.

Ferrell stars as Jackie Moon, the owner, coach and power forward of the Flint Tropics. Predictably dimwitted, he's parlayed the residuals from an awful white-guy soul single into a not-exactly-profitable basketball franchise. Being 1977, the team is teetering on the brink of extinction as the American Basketball Association is set to merge with the NBA. Sick of losing games in empty arenas, Jackie's natural huckster instincts take over and create all sorts of misguided attempts to boost attendance, but nothing seems to work in this depressed Michigan town.

As expected from a Ferrell comedy, the sidelines are full of terrific comedians improvising to their hearts' content. Will Arnett steals all of his scenes as an alcoholic color commentator who may or may not have slept with his sidekick's wife. Same goes for Bad News Bears veteran Jackie Earle Haley as the Tropics' lone devoted, hygienically challenged fan.

The movie dithers around random jokes and false starts before settling on an actual plotline—the delayed arrival of Monix (Woody Harrelson), a washed-up drunkard who might just recapture his former glory by leading the Tropics to the playoffs. What's curious is that the Harrelson story is, by and large, played straight, the stuff of your standard inspirational sports flick. Monix bristles against Andre Benjamin's wannabe superstar, while also trying to rekindle an old romance with local gal Maura Tierney. Once Semi-Pro gets rolling, Jackie Moon doesn't have much to do anymore.

It soon begins to feel like channel surfing between two different movies. Harrelson sobers up and starts teaching the Tropics how to act like a professional team, but then Ferrell barges in and wrestles a bear. I'd be curious to get a gander at Scot Armstrong's original screenplay, as it seems Jackie Moon was a minor character beefed up in pre-production to accommodate the ego of a movie star. The surreal tenor of his scenes are so at odds with the gritty Michigan locations and add so little to the story, Ferrell winds up an interruption in his own movie. ✖✖✖ movie is already about a skyscraper-sized monster—it's a bracing ride. Kudos to the ground-level perspective and queasy, you-are-there immediacy maintained by director Matt Reeves and cinematographer Michael Bonvillian. Clocking in at less than 90 minutes, Cloverfield has the good sense to end just when the novelty is starting to wear off. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Definitely, Maybe ★½ Billed as a romantic comedy despite not being particularly romantic or comedic, writer-director Adam Brooks' brutally overlong feature stars Ryan Reynolds as a divorcing dad who decides to tell his cloying 11-year-old daughter (Little Miss Sunshine's Abigail Breslin, suddenly far too aware of her own cuteness) the story of how he met her mother. For reasons that don't make any sense, Reynolds changes everybody's name and launches into an epic bedtime dissertation on his entire dating history, keeping the kid in a cheap, pointless suspense as to which of these gals will turn out to be her actual mom. Is it Elizabeth Banks' sketchily drawn, Wisconsin good girl? Or maybe it's Rachel Weisz's hard-nosed journalist? How about Isla Fisher's dippy, free spirit? The more important question is who cares? None of these women are especially fascinating, and they don't have much reason to be interested in Reynolds, a tedious blank who somehow spends 16 years in New York City running into the same three women. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Diary of the Dead ★★★ George A. Romero, 68 years old and still kicking, takes aim at the Facebook generation by turning the fifth chapter in his legendary undead series into the anti-Cloverfield. Here, a zombie apocalypse rudely interrupts the narcissistic adventures of several Pittsburgh film students. Purporting to be the kids' final (and we do mean final) project, the movie is shot on a jittery camcorder and chock full of navel-gazing narration. Often ham-fisted and abysmally acted, it nonetheless works, thanks to Romero's visceral anger at our empty reality-show culture, in which folks are so busy preening for the camera and so desperate to be famous that they can't be troubled with genuine emotion. The key moment comes when one of the gang won't flee from a zombie because he's trying to update his MySpace page. It's a parable of desensitization, and though never particularly scary, the movie scores all the points Brian De Palma's dismal Iraq war quagmire Redacted tried to make while using similar methods. These are the very funny rantings of a cranky old man. (At Kendall Square.)

Four Months, Three Weeks and Two Days ★★★ It's not a knock to call Cristian Mungiu's drama punishing, as the movie is a grinding, expertly crafted slice of Eastern European misery. Winner of the Palme d'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival and scandalously absent from this year's list of foreign language Oscar nominees, the movie keeps the camera at a discreet distance, adopting a cinéma vérité style as we follow kind-hearted Otilia (Anamaria Marinca) hustling around crumbling 1980s Romania trying to arrange an illegal abortion for her hapless roommate (Laura Vasiliu). Mungiu plays scenes out for longer than you expect, shooting in wide screen with a static camera that lingers on details and inferences inside haunting, prolonged silences. Extraordinarily well wrought, the movie is also a bit fuzzy and hard to pin down. Is Otilia a saint, a flesh-and-blood character, or just an angry filmmaker's symbolic dumping ground for a cruel world's abuses and ills? (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

In Bruges ★★★½ We could probably go the rest of our lives without sitting through another indie about wisecracking hitmen, but hell-raising U.K. playwright Martin McDonagh's droll, affecting feature accomplishes the impossible by breathing new life into moldy pulp fiction tropes. Closer in spirit to Elaine May's Mikey and Nicky or the works of John Cassavetes than any recent Tarantino knockoff, In Bruges is a shaggy, discursive trip into purgatory with a couple of ratty souls that might yet be saved. The medieval Belgian city, with its canals, architectural marvels and hordes of morbidly obese American tourists, serves as a Dante-esque way station for chattery, presumably doomed anti-heroes Ray (Colin Farrell) and Ken (Brendan Gleeson). McDonagh's tossed something to offend nearly everyone into his big-screen debut, but what's surprising is that for all the drugs, fisticuffs and potty-mouthed swagger, the film is surprisingly spiritual. There's a hefty helping of Irish Catholic angst here, with real questions of sin and redemption at stake. An unexpected delight. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

precious tale of teenage pregnancy that's more concerned with glib one-liners and arcane pop culture references than recognizable human emotion. The overqualified cast includes Ellen Page as a precocious and knocked-up 16-year-old, and Superbad's Michael Cera, pricelessly inarticulate as the baby daddy. Dependable character actors JK Simmons, Jason Bateman and Allison Janney wrestle whatever feeling they can out of Cody's one-note smarm, but director Jason Reitman undercuts their efforts with too-cute flourishes and an aura of smug self-satisfaction rivaling that of his similarly over-praised debut, Thank You for Smoking. Juno is already a hit, which is no surprise considering how much it aims to flatter its target audience. Mileage may vary, depending on your tolerance for hipster affectations. Personally, I felt like I was trapped in Allston past my bedtime. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Fenway, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

No Country for Old Men ★★★★ Adapted from the 2005 novel by Cormac McCarthy, Joel and Ethan Coen's No Country for Old Men is an enthralling, devastating movie experience. Stripped to the bone, it's a model of ruthless narrative efficiency that blossoms into something much larger than the sum of its precision-tooled parts. What at first seems like the simple saga of two tough hombres and a bag of money eventually attains a mythic, almost Biblical grandeur. For days afterwards, it haunts your dreams—the bad ones. The Coens have at last gone back to their roots, infusing No Country with the clockwork meticulousness and parched landscapes of their killer 1984 debut, Blood Simple. The movie is almost unbearably suspenseful and boasts the filmmakers' trademark strain of sicko gallows humor. But there's also something new here: a palpable sense of sorrow and genuine emotional resonance. For the first time in their brilliant career, it finally feels like the merry pranksters are out to do more than crack themselves up. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Persepolis ★★★½ Buoyant and irreverent, Marjane Satrapi's best-selling coming-of-age comic book memoir springs to life as the simplicity of black-and-white line drawings trump the computer-generated marvels we've grown accustomed to. Growing up as an outspoken female in Iran sounds like the formula for a movie far less lively, but the tone boasts a sardonic wit matching that of its spitfire heroine. (No surprise then that Satrapi directed the film along with French animator Vincent Paronnaud.) Her childhood memories of the Shah's fall and the subsequent rise of Islamic fundamentalism offer a refreshing, humanistic point of view on Middle Eastern history. Young Satrapi's punk-rock attitude and black-market Iron Maiden cassettes lead to a brief exile in Vienna before she returns and, quite movingly, attempts to assimilate into a culture where she's no longer welcome. Persepolis is funny, rambling and sad, and a welcome reminder that stubborn individualism can be found where we least expect it. (At Kendall Square, West Newton Cinema and in the suburbs.)

Sweeney Todd: The Demon Barber of Fleet Street ★★★ This isn't your kid sister's musical. Drenched in rivers of blood, Sweeney Todd is a black-hearted, at times disgustingly comic meditation on the price of vengeance. As luck would have it, Steven Sondheim's gory extravaganza is exactly what director Tim Burton needed to get his groove back. Sweeney Todd is his best picture in years—ghoulishly delightful and subversive. There is a clarity and completeness of vision marking a welcome return to Burton's mischievous Goth sensibility. Johnny Depp stars as the wronged barber who sates his thirst for retribution by slitting the throats of his customers and tossing their corpses into the basement, where his daffy old landlady (played with dizzy deadpan timing by Helena Bonham Carter) grinds up the bodies and bakes them into pies. Depp and Bonham Carter are wonderful, save for one teensy caveat: They can't sing. Burton's swooping, inventive camerawork and the soul-stirring orchestrations too often soar towards transcendence, only to be dragged down by the pedestrian vocalizing. (At Boston Common and Harvard Square.)

Vantage Point ★½ What happens when you watch a crummy 24 knock-off from a bunch of different angles? It turns out to be the same stupid movie over and over again. Written by first-timer Barry Levy with all the hopped-up gusto of a freshman film, this laughably unconvincing thriller follows a presidential assassination attempt in the crowded city square of Salamanca, Spain. The gimmick here is that the movie keeps stopping, rewinding and starting all over again from different locations featuring the hammy stylings of a different B-list actor. Dennis Quaid appears grim and constipated as a jittery secret service agent, while Forest Whitaker hyperventilates as a tourist who saw too much through his video camera. Director Pete Travis' debut has nothing to say about shifting perspectives as the temporal hiccups and shifting points of view are simply expository and only serve to jerk the audience around. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Boston Does Hollywood

The Screen Monster Fresh off our star turn in Gone Baby Gone, Boston can add a supporting role in an indie film to its résumé. On Broadway, the sophomore effort from writer/director David McLaughlin, paints a portrait of the Hub free of obsessive sports fans and cartoonish accents. A cast full of local talent captures the beauty of the city, as natives Joey McIntire, Eliza Dushku and Lance Green join Irish actors Sean Lawlor and Vincent Dowling in a character-driven story about an everyman carpenter who writes a play about his uncle's death. The small film has garnered considerable praise, winning the Director's Choice Award at Boston's Magners Irish Film Festival. On March 12, it screens at Regal Cinemas Fenway Stadium 13. Stick around for the afterparty at Cambridge 1 and toast a pint to Boston—and its filmmakers—for a job well done. Meg Duffy

Music { PAUL ROBICHEAU }

SURVIVAL SKILLS

Irish rock phenomenon Bell X1 is poised to wake up Boston.

Bell X1 plays T.T. the Bear's Place March 14.

Harry Borden

WHEN IRELAND'S chart-ringing rockers Bell X1 debut locally at T.T. the Bear's March 14, it won't mark the first time that frontman Paul Noonan has commanded a spotlight in the area. Granted, he was on the top side of the lighting rig when he worked as a stage hand at the Cape Cod Melody Tent as a college student in the summer of 1994.

"I don't know if you're familiar with the phenomenon of 12 Irish kids making whoopee in a two-bedroom house, but it was a great time," says Noonan, admitting that his job entailed cleaning toilets as well as manning a spotlight.

"At one show, my bulb blew, but I had to stay up there," Noonan says. "A friend of mine took a photograph of me from the pit and continued on next page Willie Nelson was onstage. You could see him in the foreground, and there I was in the background, asleep."

In truth, Noonan had already awakened to a music career by that time. In 1991, with his Bell X1 mates and Damien Rice, he cofounded the band Juniper. Noonan was that group's drummer, but he took over as lead singer when the mercurial Rice left for a breakout solo career.

"He just didn't want to be in a band anymore, and it took a while for us to realize that would be for the best," says Noonan, 33. "We'd all pretty much written [songs], we all sang, and we'd actually swap instruments a lot onstage."

Harry Borden

So he, bassist Dominic Philips and guitarist-keyboardists Brian Crosby and Dave Geraghty stuck together under the new moniker Bell X1, named for an aircraft that broke the sound barrier. Over three albums, the group has broken its own rarified ground. Flock, just issued as the band's first U.S. release, debuted atop the Irish album charts in 2005, sent four simultaneous singles into the Top 20 and went quadruple-platinum. Bell X1 became Ireland's biggest homeland concert attraction next to U2.

So why did it take so long to tackle America? "It's something we've wanted to make happen since we started making music," Noonan says. "To be big at home was never something we were content with." However, Island Records, the band's onetime major label, would not support a U.S. assault until Bell X1 sold more records in England, says the singer, whose group released Flock on the U.S. indie Yep Rock. Now Bell X1 is aiming to tour America three times this year. "We're in it for the long haul," Noonan says.

Flock certainly shares a broad slice of the band's moody, accessible rock, veering from the romanticism of "Eve, the Apple of My Eye" to the jazzy, spacey cycling of "My First Born for a Song" and the shuffling rush of "Reacharound." It all suggests an intersection of Coldplay, Radiohead and the Tragically Hip. Then Noonan describes "Flame," which pumps to a rigid beat, as "almost an academic exercise in disco, because it was something we'd never done before."

An optimistic atmosphere pervades the group's music. "I'm a sucker for a sweet song myself," he says from Bell X1's Dublin studio, where the band has begun work on a new CD, with Noonan finally ceding drum duties to touring drummer Tim O'Donovan. "There is the stereotype of the Irish singer-songwriter who has the weight of the fin' world on his shoulders, and I find a lot of that hard to take."

For Bell X1's first two discs, Noonan says he and Geraghty wrote songs on acoustic guitar or piano to be orchestrated by the full band, while Flock "came from the starting point of the four of us playing in the room and making some kind of noise into which songs were crowbarred." Of the current recording sessions, he says, "It's a lot more electronic-driven at this stage, but who knows where we'll end up."

Even onstage, Bell X1 layers sounds with keyboards that are linked to laptops. "When we're recording, we don't really think about how we'll actually do the tunes live," he says. "We try to be as faithful to the records as we can."

And as for showcasing Flock—an album more than two years old—across America, Noonan adds, "It's made fresh by the fact that we're playing to people who haven't heard us." ✖✖✖

Shipping up to the Paradise

The Jig Is Up

It doesn't get more Boston than this. The Dropkick Murphys—who may as well be on the Red Sox payroll—return to the Paradise Rock Club for their annual St. Paddy's bash March 16 and 17. Not only does the Quincy-bred septet provide the soundtrack for pretty much every Boston sporting event shy of the preschool soccer league, their blend of Celtic and hardcore has made them heroes to young men wearing flat caps and Irish tattoos the world over.

IMPROPER Sightings!

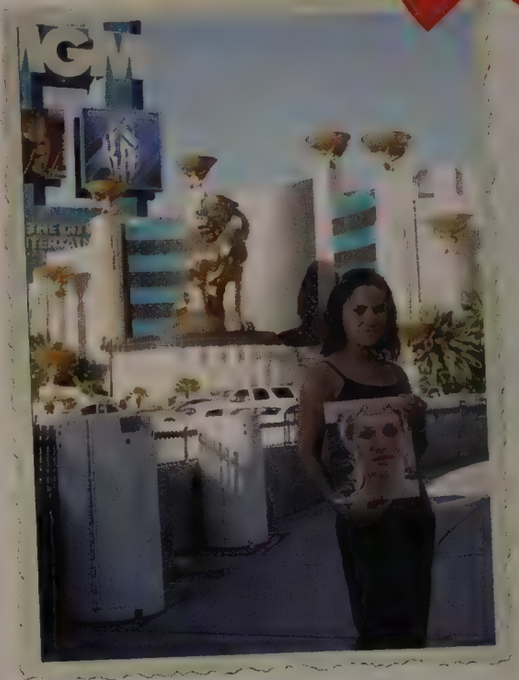
ATTENTION BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER WEARING A TED WILLIAMS JERSEY AT THE ANNUAL FROZEN DEAD GUY DAYS FESTIVAL, HELD MARCH 7–9 IN NEDERLAND, COLO.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

While in Aruba, brothers Dan, Andrew and Jeff Blum went snorkeling off the Jolly Pirate. You'd be jolly too, if your only worry was sailing around Aruba everyday.



Jennifer Irizarry snapped this shot in front of the MGM Las Vegas' giant golden lion—an attraction that's only slightly more popular than the Hooters Casino Hotel's giant golden boob.

Mayor Ara James Najarian of Glendale, Calif., sports a California tan and a fashion-forward purple and gold tie while perusing our Music issue. Way to think outside the box, Mr. Mayor.

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

FISHY BUSINESS

[FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19]
If you want your birthday wish to take effect sooner rather than later, use the Pisces new moon on March 7 to make some potent magic. That's the optimum time to initiate something that resonates deep within you, even a desire you can't quite verbalize. Since there's so much planetary energy emanating from both your idealistic Neptune ruler and altruistic Uranus in your sign, you don't have to restrict your wish to the realm of reality. "World peace" may be too vague, but something personal yet equally unattainable could work.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
Seems like old times? Only if you're nostalgic for what was happening at the end of September, the first time your Mars ruler crossed from mobile Gemini to maternal Cancer. Or perhaps you're longing for another New Year's Eve experience, which is when retrograde Mars backtracked across that contradictory cusp. The third and final (for another two years) transition occurs on March 4; however, you might not be in a welcoming mood until Mars blazes a brand new path for you a month from now. How about clearing some space for what's coming next?

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
There are times when the Bull poses as the poster child for practicality—and then there a few times in the course of a year when your artistic nature oozes all over the place. This is the time to go for the glamour shot, get the head-to-toe makeover and perform the spectacular musical number you've been rehearsing in your head. While your romantic, magnetic Venus ruler merges with imaginative Neptune in tech-savvy Aquarius, you won't need to audition. An online appearance can show the world how talented, how desirable you really are.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
It's mainly the Twins born in mid-June who've been jerked around during Mars' biannual trip through your sign. After the red planet left Gemini in September, the urge to take immediate action and change the course you were on may have waned. But after Mr. Macho went into reverse and re-entered your sign at New Year's, the desire to do something drastic returned. Good news: Mars is no longer attacking and/or refining the image of yourself that you'd like to present. It leaves Gemini on March 4 not to return until July 2009.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
It's not going to last forever, so make the most of Mars' transit through your sign from March 4 to May 9. Schedule dental surgery, a tummy tuck, Botox shots or whatever physical flaw can be fixed with a needle, knife or acid peel. Once Mars moves on to Leo, that window of opportunity shuts down for another two years. If your outward appearance is okay but your mental state needs tweaking, the Pisces new moon on March 7 would be an excellent time for a Moon Child to travel to a place you've never been, to open your mind.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
There's more to the Leo-Pisces connection than the feline's compunction to catch, toy with and devour fish. Lions get another shot at figuring out what that attraction is once the Pisces sun/moon conjunction on March 7 provides an opportunity to explore the places Fish are currently hanging out—e.g., the bank or the bedroom. Just be prepared to be stunned when your sun ruler runs into erratic, often erotic Uranus that weekend. Theirs is the kind of encounter that's been known to make the earth move. Pray it's not the Big One.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22]
Sooner than expected, the unexpected. Whenever there's significant planetary activity in your Pisces house of partners, the diligent Virgin should remember that it's high time to seek shelter from the approaching storm. That's because unpredictable Uranus, moored for the past four years in that emotional water sign, blows hot and cold, but either way, blow it will. Try to walk softly until the collision scheduled for March 8 occurs, and carry a big stick so you can ward off the flak heading your way during the eruption. A survival kit couldn't hurt.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
It's a matter of focus. Will you choose to concentrate on the fantasy you envision happening while your agreeable Venus ruler embraces idealistic Neptune in your Aquarius house of romance and recreation? Say, a picture-perfect ski weekend? Or will you rise to the challenge a coworker is laying on your desktop and come up with a brilliant, inventive solution? My money is on the fun-and-games alternative; however, at the moment, Libra is full of surprises, a major one being your reluctance to maintain a balance between work and play.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
It's not the first time you'll confront your ambivalence, but it could well be the last, at least for the next two years. The third challenging opposition in the past six months between your coruling planets takes place this week. Only this time Pluto is in constructive Capricorn, not pontificating Sagittarius, and Mars is in family-centered Cancer, not in flighty Gemini. You're apt to overreact when you realize you're at cross-purposes again, but with a bit more patience, the situation will work out satisfactorily.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Keep those sensors tuned for an early warning sign. Whether it comes at you like a bolt from the blue or you sense it building ever so slowly, step by constructive step, Centaurs are in for something that could be construed as a gift from the gods. It all depends on what your growth-oriented Jupiter ruler points you towards when it favors independent Uranus next week. If you put out the word that you're looking to make a significant change, your message may come across as a plea for financial aid. Try to be clear; think before you text.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
Read for Sagittarius. In some way that's not readily apparent, your signs are tied together this month. Since prescient Jupiter is in Capricorn, you're likely to be the one who'll take the lead or be first to see what's coming. Pay particular attention to what flows from the Pisces new moon on March 7 and the sun's conjunction with inventive Uranus. No matter how "out there" the ideas you originate may seem, now isn't an appropriate time to play the typical Cap conservative role. Whose interests are you protecting?

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
"Creative accounting" is one way to describe the effect innovative Uranus in your Pisces money house has on your checkbook. Shortly after the annual Pisces sun/moon conjunction re-energizes your ruling planet, you may discover another way to utilize its power to dazzle. Look for a nontraditional approach to acquire something you want quite badly. Then mention it to a few imaginative folks and see what happens. There's no telling what sort of miracle will materialize when mystical Neptune in your sign works its magic.

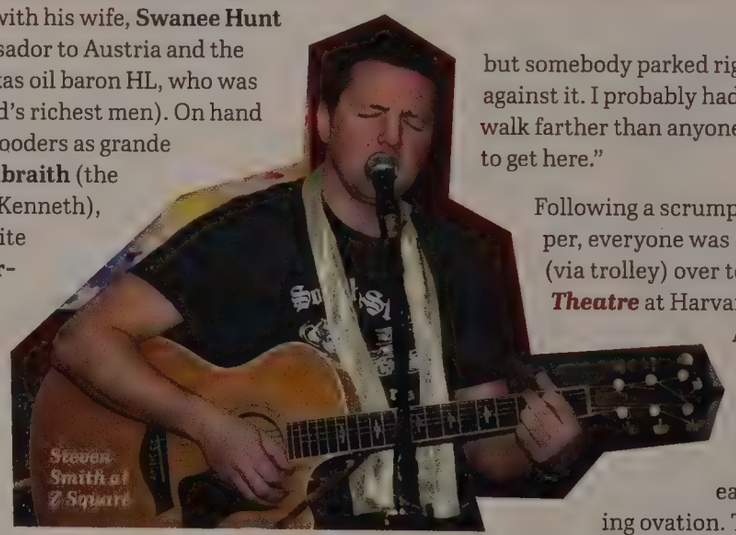
ON UPSKIRTS AND ORCHESTRAS...

Too Much of a Good Thing...

Musically speaking, this city's got lots to brag about, but the Boston Landmarks Orchestra is probably the best organization you've never heard of.

Dedicated to presenting free orchestral music at historic venues, it was founded by conductor Charles Ansbacher and David Rockefeller Jr., and they held a sparkly little soiree at the art-packed Brattle Street mansion that Ansbacher shares with his wife, Swanee Hunt (former ambassador to Austria and the daughter of Texas oil baron HL, who was one of the world's richest men). On hand were such do-gooders as grande dame Kitty Galbraith (the widow of John Kenneth), swanlike socialite Stephanie Warburg, junior oligarchs Rachael and Andy Goldfarb (her mother is one of Hunt's best buds), babe-a-licious Back Bay blonde Leigh Weatherly Denny, contemporary art collector and investment guru Enid Beal, and Cambridge doyenne Ann Gund, who lamented, "We live next door and Swanee suggested we put a gate in the fence, but somebody parked right up against it. I probably had to walk farther than anyone else to get here."



Following a scrumptious supper, everyone was shuttled (via trolley) over to Sanders Theatre at Harvard, where Ansbacher conducted an all-Brahms concert and earned a standing ovation. Then everyone went home, except for one guest who had already slipped out at intermission, saying, "That was very beautiful. In fact, I think that was enough beauty for one night."

Jim Ficicello, Mary Kakas and Swanee Hunt at the party for the BLO

Faux Pas "R" Us...

How's this for embarrassing? I go to a record release party for Steven Smith, frontman for Dirty Vegas, who's just released a solo album. The party's at the super-groovy bar Z Square (where the Hasty Pudding Club recently entertained Charlize Theron), and Smith, perched on a stool, does a six-song acoustic set, including two classic tunes by the Rolling Stones.

Afterwards, yours truly goes over for a chat, where I compliment him on the cover he did of... "Oh, what's that song? You know. Uh..."

Smith mentions the two Rolling Stones songs.

"No, no. The other one.... I know! 'Days Go By'!"

Finishing School Might Help...

Memo to Paris, Britney, Lindsay and all the other Hollywood rehab princesses: You should have come to Community Servings' party at Azure to learn how a girl with nice legs exits a car. Without flashing her privates, this stunning blonde (pictured at right) managed to extricate herself from the back seat of a two-door Scandinavian sedan (not even a limo, which means the degree of difficulty was a 10). So the next time I see paparazzi shots of your chochas, I'm going to assume that either you're too lazy to pull your skirt down or too stupid to differentiate between a guy with a camera and a gynecologist.

"Um, I wrote that," Smith says diplomatically, while my friend rubs it in by adding, "He won a fing Grammy for it." Uncomfortable laughter accompanies my face turning a shade Crayola would call vermilion. Good thing I'm wearing Italian shoes. They taste better.

Night Longa, Speech Brevis...

There was a shortage of whale pants but enough sufficiently nimble bartenders to serve a typical sailing crowd when the Commodore's Salute to benefit the Courageous Sailing Center took place at the InterContinental Hotel. The evening attracted such salty dogs as cochairs Clay Deutsch and Gregg Nourjian, ESPN and Olympic sailing commentator Gary Jobson, Reebok skipper Paul Foster, yacht dealer Jon Rotenberg, several yacht club commodores and Mayor Menino, who may not be much of a sailor but certainly knows how to accept an award without bloviating endlessly. That alone gets our vote.

Who Wore It Better?

The results of the poll are in as to which of the two women wearing the same dress looked better at the Liberty Hotel's Veuve Clicquot party. As the very perceptive Mike Tullie put it: "Usually those segments in magazines give a full-length view, so people can rank on the shoes, or the legs, or the jewelry. These two both look like they got it right, but if one of them is wearing Air Jordans or Crocs, then we could sling a little mud." Thanks, Mike. You've just been promoted to sergeant of the Fashion Police. Joan Rivers will be in touch. ✖✖✖

Let's Talk About Sox

We get excited about every cover, whether it features a star actor or a local personality. But when Mike Lowell agreed to pose for our Red Sox issue, we were beyond thrilled. Our celebrity photographer, Kerry Brett, traveled to Florida to capture the third baseman and 2007 World Series MVP at spring training. The resulting images were so good and Lowell so lovely, we decided to use two of them. For the first time in the Improper's history, we're doing a split run—meaning half the magazines will hit the street with one shot, half with another.

The covers are just one reason to collect the issue. Inside, you'll find a guide to baseball season from writers Rich Levine and Nick Altschuller. In addition to Levine's interview with Lowell, our guys analyze the team's prospects, talk stats and make prop bets. They look at Fenway's new amenities and concoct a drinking game. There's also an Improper Red Sox calendar, ideal for sticking to the fridge.

The ballpark might be ground zero for junk food, but these days it doesn't come cheap. So where can you score a tasty bargain? Managing editor Andrew Rimas stepped up to the plate, eating his way through Boston's best meals under 10 bucks. Check out his calorie-packed favorites in the dining feature and then grab the antacid. It's going to be a long spring.

MICHELIN MAN

In the culinary jungles of Paris, New York and London, the king of the food chain is the three-star Michelin chef. Boston isn't the usual habitat for such rarified animals. So when Guy Martin, one such creature of Paris's Grand Véfour and Sensing, announced that he was opening another Sensing in the North End's luxury Battery Wharf development, the gastrogentsia swooned.

"The menu will be very much alive," says Martin. "A classic division of plates with a strong approach to healthy cuisine."

Tousle-haired and grave, Martin is the image of a Gallic artist, albeit one who works in fresh lobster meat and multimillion-dollar ventures. His philosophy, he says, is to approach "the soul of the food. To translate a human aspect to the art of food and wine." To Martin, this means creating a cuisine that appeals to all five senses. Hence Sensing.

"It is sans frontiers, sans taboos," he says. "Spices from Morocco, sumac from Indonesia, wasabi from Japan. And the best local producers. There has to be a real dialogue between producers and chef."

Exactly the point most celebrity cuisiniers would make. But what distinguishes a three-star Michelin man, reveals Martin, is know-how. "After many years, once you've mastered [the skills], your imagination can run its course. You can show people how to do things. That mix of teaching and imagination makes the creation of a dish possible."

Sensing at Battery Wharf is scheduled to open in late spring.

Drink of the Moment

Home Bru

It's cheap and it goes down easy—well, it goes down. It's Brubaker. Simultaneously revered and reviled, it's the choice of alcoholics, spendthrifts and people who'd rather hang out on a barstool than risk the dance floor. As such, Brubaker is the subject of myth and speculation.

Rumor #1: Brubaker comes in recycled bottles. True! Apparently Brubaker's distinctive short-neck, 16 oz. bottle is hard to find nowadays, so the glass is shipped back to the brewery for refilling. That means 10 years' worth of bum and frat-boy lips have touched your mouth. Bottoms up!

Rumor #2: Brubaker is created by a nefarious Pennsylvania brewery bent on corroding Bostonian livers. Half-true! Brubaker is actually the brain-child of local property manager Henry Vara. After selling Knickerbocker beer in the early '90s and having obvious trouble with the naming rights, he turned to Lions Brewery in Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Vara sifted through hundreds of stock recipes looking for a new product until settling on the lager we know and learned to love. "It's a price-driven beer," Vara explains. "It's a value for people who're looking for bang for their buck. It costs $2.50 to $2.95, and that's what it's designed to be."

Brubaker is found at local VFWs and city watering holes under Vara's control: the Beacon Hill Pub, Sullivan's Tap, Mary Anne's. Our House West goes through 50 cases a week.

"We're in the midst of selling out today," says Sinque Smith, bartender at the Tam. "We sell about three cases a night," Smith continues, before turning to cut a patron off at 5:15 in the afternoon on a weekday. "It's by far the most popular beer in the bar. And as soon as it gets to around 10 o'clock and people start to realize that we don't have any more, they start heading out."

For the uninitiated, here's what you need to know about the taste: Brubaker has never been ordered by anyone sober with more than $5 in their pockets. Taste really isn't the point. It's a cheap vehicle for alcohol, which makes it the favorite of students, men of ill repute and people with nothing better to do during working hours. It's Boston's PBR, innocuous but slightly unpalatable, all contrivance beaten out until it's just a battered shell of a beer. That's what makes it lovable. You can't help but look at it longingly through one squinted eye, thinking that if things aren't too fuzzy in the morning, there'll probably be a good story to tell.

NICK ALTSCHULLER

"Brubaker makes the world go round," says Sinque Smith, a bartender at the Tam

Good Eats

ALL MIXED UP

There are 10 other rice dishes at Buk Kyung II, but only one arrives sizzling in your very own stone cauldron—and it's arguably the only option whose last bite tastes better than the first. As it sits (or, rather, as it's stirred), kopdol bi bim bap ($12.95) morphs dramatically. What begins as a tidy arrangement—essentially a composed salad of steamed white rice topped with shredded beef, julienne vegetables, bean sprouts, shiitakes, spinach leaves, lily buds, a sunny side–up egg, a sprinkle of sesame seeds and a heavy douse of fermented chili pepper paste—evolves into a savory mishmash centered on a now–deeply caramelized bed of rice. (Paella fans will recognize the similarity to soccarat.) The result certainly fits the name's literal translation, "mixed meal."

Question for Jeff Ross

What are the three most memorable roasts of your illustrious career as a professional ball-buster?

1. Pamela Anderson: That's the one everyone talks about. By the end I had made out with Andy Dick and had Bea Arthur holding me down while Courtney Love beat the crap out of me.

2. Hugh Hefner: It was only a couple weeks after 9/11 and we weren't sure whether we felt right throwing on tuxedos and making jokes in New York City, but we decided we had to do it. We convinced Hugh and his pussy posse to hop on a plane, and a bunch of my friends, like Jimmy Kimmel, Sarah Silverman and Adam Carolla, came out. We raised almost a half million dollars.

3. My cousin: My 26-year-old cousin had been living in my guest house in L.A. while he was trying to find his place in the world, and when he left we threw him a big going-away roast. Good roasts are based on great friendships, and I think there's a new trend toward the homegrown roast. Everyone has a friend that deserves a pat on the back and a kick in the ass.

RICH LEVINE

Jeff Ross appears at the Comedy Connection March 28 and 29 and will star in his own one-hour special this summer on Comedy Central.

Cheap Thrills

In my world, getting a good bottle of wine is easy if you spend a lot of money, but where's the challenge? The French have long reserved a special place in their gastronomic hearts for "les vins de soif"—wines to quench your thirst. The following picks qualify: They have loads of charm but don't make you think too much.

Good Hope Chenin Blanc
Stellenbosch, South Africa, 2007 ($11 at Best Cellars, Brookline or Boston)

Which varietal will provide these thrills? Chardonnay? Pinot noir? Nope—way too popular. How about a really unloved grape? Chenin blanc, for instance. This bargain-in-a-bottle features mineral, earth and ripe pear aromas, a soft, mellow texture, and it's dry through and through. Quite a tasty quaff, on its own or with spicy shellfish.

Peter Lehmann Riesling
Eden Valley, Australia, 2007 ($14 at Macy's, West Roxbury)

Hold the objection: Very few Aussie rieslings are sweet. This one's got an exciting bouquet of lemon, lime and spring flowers. Clean, tart and bone dry, its green apple–like flavors linger into the finish. Perfect with salads, it won't back down from a mild vinaigrette.

Inama Soave Classico
Veneto, Italy, 2006
($15 at Brix, South End)

Round and smooth, with a hint of white pepper and a perky lemon-butter flavor—what's not to love? Soave is so déclassé that it's finally back. It's grown up, we've grown up, and Inama is officially in the Cheap Wine Hall of Fame. Produced at a family estate, with the hand-harvested attention given to a top chardonnay but at a third of the price, it's great with a fish fry.

Pinol Ludovicus
Terra Alta, Spain, 2006
($13 at Brix, South End)

This one's beyond obscure, but if you troll the right neighborhood near a famous wine district (Priorato), you'll often find something cheap and delicious. A blend of garnacha, tempranillo, syrah and cabernet sauvignon, this baby's full of tart, luscious black-fruit flavors, with a fleshy texture and some exotic spice-box accents. Yet with easy tannins, it's an ideal foil for ribs or barbecued chicken.

Bogle Petite Sirah
California, 2005 ($15 at the Wine Gallery, Brookline)

A "wow" wine, a real mouthful of chocolatey, earthy, big peppery ripe fruit in a glass. There's nothing petite about this pour. The Bogle name has become synonymous with great value among those who enjoy rustic California reds, and this opaque-colored beauty can stand up to the juiciest charred burger.

Master of wine Sandy Block, vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods

CONGRESS IS IN SESSION

On the quiet first floor of the Seaport's new Renaissance Hotel, 606 Congress stands incognito. This is the land of potential energy, an area we've long been told is primed to explode. But after plugging our ears for a couple of tense years, we moved on with our lives. This silence may prove to be the calm before the storm.

Open since Feb. 18, 606 Congress remains hidden from Boston's epicures. "The design of the hotel has taken so long; you can see the crane right next to us," executive chef Toby Hill explains. "Plus, we wanted to make sure we have the right product before we get bombarded."

And that product is... tapas, though that description comes with a disclaimer. "They're not small bites. Half-sized portions is really what it is, but the only way you can describe it is calling it tapas," Hill says. The fact that the dishes were codesigned by Michael Schlow (Radius, Via Matta, Great Bay) should further ease cynics. The resulting dinner menu is divided into six sections, from light to heavy, with corresponding pages on the wine list.

Flexibility is key for Hill and his seven-person staff. "People don't want to be pigeonholed," Hill says. The restaurant's expansive dining room holds 130 people. There's a bar and lounge that seats 30. The lobby has its own menu. An outdoor area will accommodate 50 customers. Then there's the 471 rooms' worth of hungry visitors.

The diverse options represent a blend of Hill's classic American and Schlow's French influences. The ahi tuna ($12) is an example comprising tender squares of fish with red chilis. Hill added Satsuma tangerine to yuzu and soy to create a ponzu drizzle. Desserts are a specialty, and Toby's Homemade Root Beer Float ($9) should provide a good capper. There's also a line of cocktails ($9–$12) from former 28 Degrees manager Tim Riley. "It can be a rowdy, try-everything party, or it can be a romantic dinner. The hard part for me is that I have to be that flexible," Hill says.

Trendspotting

Takin' It to the Streets

Andrew Adams wears a vintage MCM-logo hat cocked up and to the side, a crewneck with teal and purple stripes, and Cheap Monday jeans. A 17-year-old junior at the Buckingham Browne and Nichols School in Cambridge, Adams is living proof that streetwear has gone mainstream. He just opened his own boutique, Half-Way Crooks, in cushy Newton Centre.

Half-Way Crooks joins two other players on the upscale-streetwear scene: fellow newcomer the Attic and Concepts, both in Cambridge. Their mission has evolved from outfitting city dwellers in North Face and Timberland to what Concepts buyer Frank Rivera calls "a bigger monster"—helping kids in the suburbs look hip.

"It used to be our own little safe haven, and now it's exploded," Concepts buyer Deon Point observes.

Adams' boutique carries T-shirts emblazoned with printed handguns and statements like "I Love My Glock." There are also preppy staples reimagined in shocking pinks and purples, a vibe Adams calls "street golf."

At its new, expanded Harvard Square location, Concepts focuses on exclusivity. Graffitied trompe l'oeil Nike Swooshes line the walls of the dark, sleek space. Favored shoppers are ushered into the boutique's private lounge, hidden behind a secret door and furnished with industrial-chic fireplaces and personalized lockers.

The Central Square–based Attic draws customers with its own litany of exclusive products, but more-practical pricing options set it apart. For example, the shop sells $300 premium denim on the same racks as $58 Levi's. "I don't want to alienate customers," says Attic buyer Abdul Dawson.

HI, SCI GUY

TO THE MUSEUM OF SCIENCE member who gave me four museum passes and two Omni Theater passes:
Thank you, thank you, thank you! I had parked on the ground floor of the parking garage on Feb. 17 just before 1 pm, and as I was walking from my car with my son, his best friend and my 4-year-old nephew, you stopped us and asked if we wanted your member passes for our visit to the museum. You were there with your young daughter (around 4 or 5 years old), and you had some extra passes that were about to expire; you made my day with your offer. You didn't know that I had just gotten lost on my way into the city (I am geographically challenged) and was a tad stressed and annoyed with myself. What you also didn't know is that a few months ago, my son's father stopped child-support payments... so our trip to the museum was a bit of a splurge and vacation amusement for my science-loving son. By giving us your passes, you did more for him than his own father. Your daughter is lucky to have an involved dad who shows kindness to strangers. I was hoping to run into you in the museum to offer you a coffee to say thank you, or to buy something for your daughter, but I didn't see you again. I hope you enjoyed your time in the museum as much as we all did... and in case you see this, I owe you a coffee. Thanks for proving nice guys do exist.

Stressed Suburban Single Mom

To the amazing bartender at Figs in Charlestown:

It was one of those days. You probably didn't realize it, but by just noticing me in the most subtle way and extending a cold glass of water and a few words, you, a complete stranger, made my day. So thank you from the bottom of my heart. I don't know your name or anything about you, but your generosity and thoughtfulness that night turned my gloomy day towards the sun and put a smile on my face. Thank you again.

THE HARVARD LAMPOON IS A PUBLICATION AND HUMOR ORGANIZATION THAT HAS ENTERTAINED THE HARVARD COMMUNITY SINCE 1876. HARVARDLAMPOON.COM

Q: WHAT ARE THE RULES FOR PULLING THE PERFECT APRIL FOOLS DAY PRANK?

A good prank has to be really original. Don't do pranks that have already been done. Shaving cream on the hand? Been done. Water bucket above the door? Done. Razor blades in the apple? Done all the time. Icing on the toothbrush? No, surprisingly that's never been done, though we have talked about it.

Before your prank, be sure to visit your local prank shop. Bring plenty of prank money, and also one real check so you can buy the supplies you need.

If you're pranking a gang, whoa—be careful. That is some heavy-duty shit.

The morning before a prank, we like to visit the First Baptist Church in Cambridge. There, we pray that our prank will work and that no one will get hurt. We also read some Corinthians.

When pranking, it is important that you do not get caught. If you do get caught, it is even more important that you do not get charged with a felony. If you do end up in court, it is of extreme importance that you avoid going to prison by hiring an expensive attorney. Do NOT prank him; he's there to help you. If you do end up in jail, make sure the toilet in your cell has an automatic flusher. If you don't get a toilet with an automatic flusher, make sure to hold the flusher down for at least three seconds so it all goes down. If it doesn't all go down, call the warden. Then, prank him.

In the end, if your prank takes a turn for the worst, there's a chance—a very small chance—that you might need to eat some evidence. Again, this is pretty rare and in almost all cases can be avoided—we're not animals for Christ's sake! But you might have to.

EAT, THEN EXERCISE

Seaside recipes and rockin' fitness classes

Dinner With the Kennedys

FROM THE FAMINE that drove them out of Ireland to eating fancy potato cakes prepared by Neil Connolly—chef at the Kennedy Compound for more than a decade—food is one measure of this family's achieved kingliness. With fond tales of the 800 chocolate feathers that decorated Maria and Arnold's wedding cake and casual pictures of various Kennedys roaming around in shorts, Connolly gives you a look at their life on Cape Cod in his colorful cookbook. The photos lend a guilty "I snuck into the party!" thrill, like the "rollicking brunch" with the Irish prime minister. And the recipes! Many are way upper-casual, often seaside-local. Meet the clan's beloved chocolate chip cookies, Cape Cod clam chowder (Kennedys call themselves "chowderheads"), hardwood-grilled New York sirloin steak and other fancy-pants recipes that their sophisticated palates demanded, even on vacation. "It was always a pleasure when the house filled up with the scents of winter: logs burning in the fireplace, cider steeping with cloves, oranges, and anise, and pies and breads in the oven."

In the Kennedy Kitchen by Neil Connolly with text by Elizabeth Benedict.

Dance Party

PERSONAL TRAINER Jess Perkins is putting her highly energized body and soul into teaching Zumba. Doesn't the very word make you want to wiggle and dance? Zumba was the incidental invention of one Beto Perez—"a sexy Colombian devil with ripped abs," according to Perkins—an aerobics instructor who mistakenly grabbed Latin dance music from his car before class one day. This happy accident brought mambo, salsa, cumbia, even small swirls of belly dancing into the fitness picture. Like getting down at a party, it leaves you nimble, cheerfully sweaty and strategically worked out. Perkins, with her inspiring rock-star style, has the right mix of C'mon, Move It! and mischievous joyfulness to inspire you to get dance–exercising, and all your muscle groups going, including the famous "core" that holds authority in your midsection. A Zumbacious hour can expend 400 to 700 calories. Up in this spacious studio with big windows, you have a different experience than in an enclosed gym jammed with machines; everything feels loose and open.

Jess Perkins teaches Thursdays at 6:30 pm at 357 Huron Ave. in Cambridge and Saturdays at 5 pm at 440 Somerville Ave. in Somerville. (617-968-1695) shapeuppersonal training.com. $10 per session.

Holla for Challah Bubbies and babushkas all over the map churn out their own traditional braided breads, but the vote's pretty unanimous in these parts that Shabbat dinner and Sunday brunch get their best start with a loaf from Cheryl Ann's in Brookline. Don't be fooled by the bakery's puzzlingly kosher-less name—an oddity, yes, but practically every Boston-based Hebrew schooler, rabbi and self-respecting Jewish grandmother agrees that the sight of those speed racks full of sweet, eggy, Danish-like twists is the best thing since, well, sliced bread.

FAR FROM OM

Rachel Klein brightens Aura at Seaport

A MENU WHOSE DISHES are designed to evoke the rich history of the spice trade. A dining room bedecked with elaborate textiles inspired by the Peabody-Essex Museum in Salem. For Rachel Klein, the newly hired chef of the undergoing-major-renovations Aura at the Seaport Hotel, it's no place like Om, the Cambridge restaurant where she made a major impression with complexly constructed, Asian-influenced cuisine.

Chef Rachel Klein of Aura

"I'd gotten typecast as an Asian-fusion person, but I'm not," Klein exclaims. "I love Middle Eastern, I love Southern food. Of course, loyal fans have asked me to bring over favorite dishes like General Om's Tofu, but I'll have to rename it!" she says with a laugh.

When Aura reopens within a few weeks, the lounge and lunch menus will be the first to bear Klein's imprint. Expect to taste "exotic fun stuff," she says, like Turkish spices, merguez sausage, grilled barbecued quail and the chickpea fries that attracted quite a following at Om.

Don't expect the sleek, modern style you find at most hotel dining rooms; Klein promises "the feel of a small, independent restaurant."

WHEN THE BILTMORE IN Newton reopened as a gastro-pub last year, it quickly gained neighborhood-fave status, thanks to the tasty food (including chef Seth Morrison's homemade pickles), popular bartender Sean McKeown and friendly manager Rebecca Roth. Now, the trio are gone, but new manager Jason Owens is upbeat about what the future holds for the eatery.

"We're looking to increase seats.... We're trying out new dishes." The Biltmore's ownership remains the same, of course, and Owens is acting as executive chef while the restaurant looks for a permanent replacement. "We're looking to grow this concept," he says.

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH JOANNE CHANG & CHRISTOPHER MYERS }

STIR THE POT

At Kaze Shabu Shabu Restaurant, you cook it yourself.

"I always find that there's not nearly enough time to cook the taro root," Christopher Myers intoned before tossing the vegetable into a vessel of boiling broth.

"'You always find?' You've been here once!" Joanne Chang laughed.

"OK, you're right. But it feels like we'll run out of time," he grinned.

I was listening to dinner chat with two of Boston's best-known (and engaged) restaurateurs. Recognized for their individual pursuits (Flours I and II for Chang; Radius, Via Matta and Great Bay for Myers), the couple opened their first combined effort, Myers & Chang, in the South End in September. Between their teasing and musings about how opposites attract, we were trying really hard not to overcook our meal at the brightly lit and kitschy Kaze Shabu Shabu Restaurant in Chinatown.

Going into it, we each admitted that this is not a typical night out for us. Joanne was the pro with three previous shabu meals under her belt, but this was my first time, and Christopher, who claimed to be utterly confused about the idea of making his own food, was just along for the culinary ride.

Shabu dining is a lot like fondue; a hot, salty broth sits on the table (here, on an induction cooktop built into the table), and you cook your meat, vegetables and noodles in it. As we sat down, Joanne told me that "shabu shabu" translates into "swish swish," or the sound the meat makes as it swims in the broth.

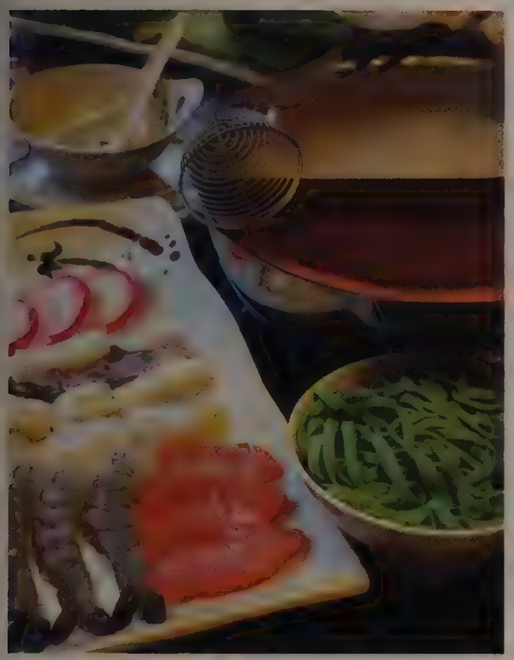
"This is cool," Christopher admitted. "I'll just sit here and totally defer to whatever Joanne decides." Good call, I thought.

She aptly guided us through the menu, advising me to try the surf and turf ($21.50) while she picked out oden ($15), a plate of fish cakes and tofu for herself. Christopher, an affable thrill-seeker, almost chose the ostrich but at the last minute changed his mind to the meat combo of rib eye and pork ($15). "I don't know if I could finish a whole plate of ostrich," he admitted.

We ordered two broths—a mild, pork-based tonkotsu and a reddish, head-clearing Korean kimchi ($3 each)—and each got platters of vegetables (cabbage, taro root and bok choy, for instance) and a choice of noodles (udon, vermicelli and mung bean) with our dishes. The appetizers ranged from crispy fried anchovies ($6.50) to spicy chicken nuggets ($5) and steamed shumai ($5.75). Thankfully, those were already cooked.

After a quick demo from our server (hand motions worked when the language barrier seemed insurmountable) and a scroll through our tools (two-pronged skewers, chop sticks), we started dropping food into the broth. My surf and turf included sliced beef

SWISH SWISH Joanne Chang and Christopher Myers go swimming.



INTO THE BROTH Fish and noodles for cooking

splayed out in a colorful layer next to a dish of raw scallops, squid, white fish, salmon (that was almost too pretty to cook) and clams. Joanne's oden turned out to be pieces of fluffy fish cake formed into various shapes. "I like that they go to all that trouble making it look so nice," Christopher said. I tried one of the larger pouches on his dare to find it full of sweet, fishy flavor as well as a gummy rice paste.

"It's really about providing delicious ingredients. It's a healthy way to eat, and I like that you can see everything in its raw state," Joanne said as she tossed a few pieces of tofu into the pot. A few minutes later, her words rang clear: A clam started reaching out of its own shell, probably looking for an escape route. I threw it into the soup only to slurp it down a few minutes later. "I would have loved if it'd actually gotten off the plate," Christopher said. I'm sure the clam felt the same way.

As we munched on noodles, bok choy and sliced rib eye, we found that no matter what we put into the pot, everything came out with the same spicy, salted flavor and cooked (mostly) to our liking. The broth, which Christopher lovingly termed "the great equalizer," kept getting richer and tastier with every ingredient we threw in. By the end, our platters were empty and we just sat slurping broth.

Looking around at the other diners (mostly Asian, mostly larger parties), it was clear that this was a fun, interactive way to eat a healthy meal. And even if it wasn't our typical night out, with the right group of people, it was certainly worth trying again. ✖✖✖

REVEAL-ATIONS

When it comes to sharing something about themselves, American Idol contestants need my help.

I TRY MY BEST NOT TO write about TV shows, on the assumption that even a top-rated show is only watched by a fraction of the population. But thanks to the writers' strike, I've been talking about TV again, because the strangulation of scripted programs means that there's only one show left: American Idol. I can discuss American Idol secure in the knowledge that you watch it. When it's not on, my TV just goes dark, and I stare at it in a state of expectant confusion, like a caveman during a solar eclipse.

Lately, I've taken a great interest in the Idol pre-singing video segments, in which contestants reveal a little something about themselves. A couple weeks ago, contestants spoke on the topic "What America doesn't know about me." Almost without fail, these vignettes were a disaster, and they made me realize that these people need my help.

First of all, one of the guys, Michael Johns, used this forum to talk about how good he is at tennis. This video came off as, "You might be surprised to learn that I'm an even cooler dude than you thought I was. You might say, 'That guy's too good-looking, and too great of a singer, to also be awesome at tennis.' Well, you'd be wrong." Incidentally, Michael Johns, you don't get to call yourself a "jock" if you play tennis. Jocks beat up tennis players. I'll let that slide because you're from Australia, so maybe you didn't know. But in America, you're not a jock unless you play a sport that has cheerleaders.

Two other contestants, David Cook and Amanda Overmyer, dropped the shocking revelations that they enjoy crosswords and reading, respectively. The ironic thing is that, by revealing their penchant for crosswords and books, these Idol contestants are trying to say, "See, we're just normal people," while forgetting that the entire point of the show is to convince everyone that they're NOT normal people. Certainly, we would be surprised to learn that Bret Michaels enjoys crossword puzzles, unless said puzzles are tattooed on the lower back of a skanky stripper. But to find out that a dorky, introspective guy likes word games? No way! Slow down, rock star!

Probably the most successful "What America doesn't know about me" vignette came from Syesha Mercado, who revealed that she'd been in a commercial. In it, she plays a wife who commands her irritated husband, Dwayne, to go find her some "big, beautiful seashells" on a beach. Intriguingly, we never learn what this commercial is for. Shells? Beaches? Divorce lawyers who specialize in domineering mollusk-hoarders? We just don't know. And then, as if that wasn't enough, she took it to the next level, offering a second item America doesn't know about her: She can make a noise just like a baby crying, which she promptly demonstrated. It was totally creepy. It sounded like she ate a baby and it was caught in her throat. This got me thinking: What surprising thing about myself would I reveal on American Idol?

Well, for starters, I've been to jail. But enough about me. My friends and family are the real freaks. My cousin claims she's never burped and is in fact incapable of burping, but can accomplish the same function by "making a noise like a dinosaur." My wife, Heather, gets goosebumps when she brushes her teeth. Heather also hates when people bend their ears forward, because she feels they might get stuck that way.

Here's another fun one: When my mother worked at a hospital in Maine, she once came home with a rolled-up foam mattress pad. My dad stuck his arm through it and was waving it around when he casually asked, "So where'd you get this?" to which she replied, "It was on a guy's bed, but he died so they didn't need it anymore." My father then flung the aforementioned dead-guy mattress pad off his arm while yelling, "Eww! Eww! Eww!" And that's how my father learned to steer clear of any freebies my mom brought home from the hospital.

In the early '90s, my friend Brian in Los Angeles played a Rollerblading boardwalk purse-snatcher on the short-lived beach-cop drama Pacific Blue. His job was to skate away from the cops with a yellow python on his shoulders, then do a rail grind and fall, snake and all, into the sand. This required several takes, apparently. He still gets the occasional Pac-Blue royalty check.

See? It's not that hard. Any of these stories would be better than "I was a musical prodigy" (Jason Yeager's incredibly lame offering) or "I like crossword puzzles" or "I play tennis!" Come on, Idol contestants. You can't really be all that boring. It's too bad nobody used to be a lap-dancer at a gay strip club, because that's the sort of thing that seems like it might get people's attention. ✖✖✖

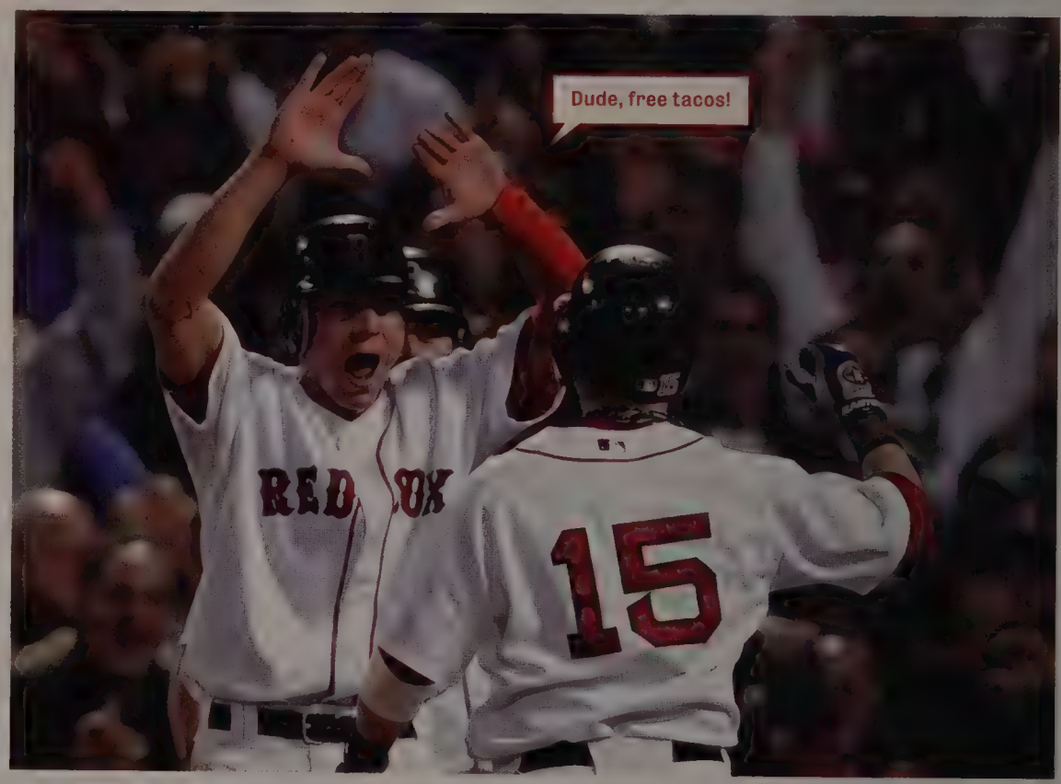
YOUNG AT HEART

The Sox success or failure may hinge on the kids.



LEAVING FORT MYERS is always a day of mixed emotions. It's rough giving up the fabulous weather to go back to ice and snow. But as much fun as it is to follow the Sox in 80-degree heat for two weeks, Fort Myers won't be confused with Fort Lauderdale anytime soon.

This year, I decided to make the trek across Alligator Alley to the east coast and Fort Lauderdale. During the drive, with plenty of time to reflect on pitchers and catchers, one word kept jumping out at me: confidence.

Not just the typical "Yes we can" type of confidence, but the kind the Patriots showed in the week leading up to the Super Bowl. They'd won 18 games, earning the right to feel that way. The Sox still have a season ahead of them.

Yes, they're defending champs, but they haven't won anything in 2008. This is a new year, but I'm getting the feeling everyone expects the same results: Josh Beckett pitching like a Cy Young winner, Manny Ramirez clubbing walk-off homers and Jonathan Papelbon dancing his way into late October.

Of course, there's a reason for the optimism. The Sox are churning out prospects like the Patriots were churning out wins. One thing that struck me after talking to young'uns like Dustin Pedroia, Jacoby Ellsbury and Clay Buchholz was that word. Confidence. Or maybe it was another c-word—cocky. These kids performed marvelously in the clutch. They should feel good about themselves. Whatever you want to call it, it permeates the organization.

I give general manager Theo Epstein credit. He says finding prospects is a matter of having a scouting department filled with good people with good eyes and a gift for forecasting development. You should know that Epstein's boys have a book the size of The Communist Manifesto when it comes to scouting players. Well, the book is working damn well, because nobody finds them as well as the Sox.

But back to the players. Pedroia is just amazing to me. It's great to get a feel for these guys out of uniform, and I got a chance when he came over to be a guest on my show, Sports Late Night. The funny thing is, as I watched him walking across the field toward our set, I thought it was a teenager looking for a little face time. Wearing a trendy cap and a tight T-shirt, it wasn't until he was 50 feet away that I realized this was the reigning American League Rookie of the Year, not some teenybopper.

Pedroia averaged .317 last season, which is incredible considering he was under .200 for the entire month of April. I asked him if he could get to .320 this year and he looked at me like I had two heads. "How about .330?" he said.

I loved it. How can you not believe him? I asked him if he'd hit more homers this season than the eight he hit in 2007. "Hell, yeah," he snapped back.

Is he setting himself up for disaster? Or is he the real deal? Wasn't it Reggie Jackson who said, "It ain't bragging if you can back it up"?

Ellsbury, less brash than Pedroia, is an interesting case. He hit .438 in the World Series after earning very little big league experience. I sat and watched Ellsbury hit in the cage until his hands bled. He reeks of confidence. You can see the World Series successes have him shooting for the stars this season, and the drive Pedroia and Ellsbury have is something they need to bottle and serve to Buchholz.

He's got talent, up there with Josh Beckett, but the Red Sox shut him down and sent him home last year because of his work ethic. He was having too much fun and needed a bit of Bill Belichick's humble pie.

"Beckett griped me out," Buchholz told me. "I wasn't able to pitch and it has to be my fault. They [Epstein, Terry Francona, John Farrell] sat me down and talked to me. They're weren't mad but disappointed that I wouldn't be in the rotation."

The fact that he arrived at camp nearly 15 pounds heavier, with some of the definition that comes with weight lifting, is a good sign. He's a wild card on this team. If he gets what Pedroia and Ellsbury have, the best really may be yet to come. ***

APRIL FOOLS, KEVIN LOVE, A TRIP TO JAPAN AND LIL FUNK

3 Green Issues

Someone Get Him a Bib... The most frustrating thing about Kendrick Perkins right now is that his biggest faults are the ones that should be the easiest to fix. How does a guy have a 20-rebound game and a six-block half in the same week, yet still need to uncontrollably dribble the ball, or bring it down to his ankles every time he touches it. It's like if you had a carpenter who was a really great worker, but sucked at hammering nails.

Yes, But He's a Very Wise Alien... We were sitting at a Celtics game the other night and saw Sam Cassell on the bench lecturing one of his new teammates. We couldn't see who the guy was, but he was nodding feverishly, and just as we were about to ask, "Hey, is that Rondo or Tony?" the bodies clear and there's Paul Pierce, hanging on Sam I Am's every word like a kindergartner on the first day of school. We feel very good about the Sam Cassell Experiment.

Really Big Funk... This is slightly off topic, but someone's got to tell the big white kid in Lil Funk that his time has come and gone. He's had a great run and brings some very solid moves to the table, but honestly, it's starting to look like one of the North Pole scenes from Elf when Lil Funk takes the stage.

2 SHOTS AT MADNESS

1. We've Got Wooden... Our pick to win it all? UCLA. The Bruins have a great coach, veteran leadership, an NBA-caliber point guard (Russell Westbrook) and Kevin Love, probably the most dangerous low-post player in the country. He's like Kevin McHale in Kevin Pittsnogle's body with, um... Davis Love's last name. Thirteen of the last 20 national champions have been No. 1 seeds, so this seems like the safe bet.

2. Spartans!... If UCLA is the safe pick, we need to give you a sleeper, and... it's North Carolina. Ah, funny stuff. Seriously though, Michigan State's our team. Again, they've got a legit coach, played a killer schedule and, in Drew Neitzel, have one of the most clutch players in the game.

ONE THING BETTER THAN WATCHING GINO...

Is watching Kevin Garnett and Paul Pierce watch Gino. Not sure why we find this so amusing (OK, it's secretly because when Paul and KG are laughing at the same thing as us, in the same place as us, it sort of feels like we're all hanging out together instead of us just staring at them obsessively from across a basketball arena), but it's always a great way to cap off another blowout win.

5 APRIL FOOLS PRANKS

For Matt Walsh: 1) Hop a flight to Hawaii, find Walsh on the golf course and shake his hand wearing one of those old-school palm buzzers. 2) Scream "April Fools!" and wait for him to laugh. 3) Drop an anvil on his head. 4) Say, "No, but seriously. April Fools!"

For the Chicago Bulls: 1) Before their April 1 game against the Celtics, sneak into the Bulls' locker room and stamp a permanent, and revealing, photo of Kevin Garnett's wife on their jerseys. 2) Laugh as KG goes for 40/20 and literally devours their entire starting five.

For Roger Clemens: 1) Get ahold of the Rocket's morning paper and change headline to "McNamee Comes Clean; Clemens' Glory Restored!" 2) Follow with a call to Roger's cell phone, pretending to be his agent and congratulating him on the great news. 3) Hang up and immediately text him, "April Fools, fat ass. You're suspect!"

For Terry Francona: Here's a pre–April Fools gag: 1) Hack into the airline super computer and fix it so the skipper has to sit between Julian Tavarez and Curt Schilling, and in front of Manny Ramirez (he still kicks the seat on long flights) for the entire trip back from Japan. 2) Replace his emergency inflight pouch of chew with turkey jerky.

For Patriots defensive coordinator Dean Pees: 1) Call coach Pees and tell him that he currently has only two linebackers (and average ones at that) on the roster born after 1977. 2) Explain that additionally the team has decided not to retain the players who accounted for 10 of the secondary's 14 interceptions in 2007. 3) Realize that this is not a joke but a cruel, cruel reality. 4) Weep gently into phone.

4 DATES TO WATCH

3/20 It's the greatest day of the sporting year: Day 1 of the NCAA Tournament (now with extra Gus Johnson!). Tune in to see which team springs the big upset and which minority group Billy Packer offends.

3/25 The Red Sox kick off the 2008 season this morning against the A's in Japan. With Curt Schilling and Josh Beckett on the shelf, and Dice-K potentially out on paternity leave, we say re-sign Hideo Nomo for a week. He's got to have a little left in the tank, and with him on the mound it's essentially a home game.

3/26 The Celtics host the new-look Suns. It's still fun when Shaq comes to town, but at this point, he's like Guns 'n' Roses: If they were in town, you'd still want to go see them, but there's a 90 percent chance you're leaving disappointed.

3/27 On TV tonight you've got the Sweet 16 on CBS or a tilt between the struggling Bruins and hapless Maple Leafs on NESN. Hmm, tough choice. Thank God for DVR!

STELLA ARTOIS

erfection HAS ITS PLACE

rfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION
The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE
The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY
The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD
The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL
The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING
While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT
The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING
The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL
A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

Soroff On JIM STURGESS

The British actor on codpieces, gambling and Marmite

THIS LOOKS TO BE JIM STURGESS' YEAR. Sturgess, 29, is fresh off the success of the critically acclaimed Across the Universe (which used Beatles songs to tell a love story set in the 1960s), and this month he stars in two hotly anticipated films: 21, opposite Kevin Spacey and Kate Bosworth, based on Boston author Ben Mezrich's book about the MIT blackjack team; and The Other Boleyn Girl, opposite Scarlett Johansson, Natalie Portman and Eric Bana, in which he plays the brother of Henry VIII's doomed wife. Born and raised in London, he attended the University of Salford. His current projects include Crossing Over, with Harrison Ford, Ashley Judd and Sean Penn. Sturgess lives in the Camden section of London.

Jonathan Soroff: Do you think of yourself more as a singer or an actor?

Jim Sturgess: I'm totally both. I've done both since I was about 13 or 14. I've always written songs, and I've always enjoyed acting. They sort of go hand-in-hand for me.

Favorite musical?
Film-wise, Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory. The one with Gene Wilder.

Ever want to tackle that role?
[Chuckles.] I would love to play Willy Wonka, but it's already been done.

By both Gene Wilder and Johnny Depp, no less.
Yeah. Speaking of which, I saw Sweeney Todd the other day. I thought he did a good job. He's got a sort of David Bowie vibe with his singing, which I thought was great.

When you're in the United States, does the British accent get you laid?
No. [Laughs.] But since doing 21, where I had to learn to do an American accent, every time I come over to America I develop this strange trans-Atlantic, half-American, half-English kinda hybrid accent, which is worrying.

One thing that's better about the United Kingdom than the U.S.?
I'm going to have to say the music.

One thing that's better about the U.S. than the U.K.?
The food. It's amazing. Until I came to America, I never knew England was known for its bad food.

Red carpet beauty secrets?
[Laughs.] You're talkin' to me, man. Look at me. I have no beauty secrets. I guess just wear the same pair of shoes on both feet.

Thing you liked best about Boston?
The whiskey. There was a great selection. But seriously, Boston was a godsend for us. We'd been in Vegas for such a long time, we were just desperate to be in a normal place where you could sit in a normal bar and have a normal drink with some normal people. It's also the most English American city I've ever been to, and it was nice because by that point I was missing home and it was a pretty good substitute.

If you could be any Beatle, which one and why?
All of them combined. They're all such strong characters, and the combination of them created that amazing phenomenon.

Favorite Beatles tune?
Ouch. It's so hard to say. But I guess "A Day in the Life" would be a decent choice if I was forced to pick one, because you get the best of both Lennon and McCartney in that song.

OK, who's hotter: you or Eric Bana?
[Laughs.] Definitely Eric Bana.

Did you get to wear a codpiece in that movie?
Yeah, and that's why Eric's hotter. His codpiece is significantly larger than mine. But the costume department was very good to me. I think I came in a close second. Eric's was studded with jewels, though, and far grander than anyone else's.

Are you a good blackjack player?
I am now. I wasn't before we did 21. I'd never been to Vegas. I'd never been to a casino before we started shooting 21.

And now you're a compulsive gambler.
Not at all. In fact, the whole thing kind of put me off gambling. We were there for such a long time, and we were in the casino. It was an amazing experience to be immersed in that world; it's sort of a fun place to visit, but I wouldn't want to live there.

But now you're an expert at blackjack. Why not make a killing?
Well, they trained us to a certain level. We got to be as good as you can get without taking it to the next level, which is card counting, but that's something that only someone with a really strong mathematical mind can pull off, and that's not me.

The most difficult part of working with Kevin Spacey?
Keeping up with his brilliant mind. You really have to listen to what he's doing, because he can change the line, or throw you something that just comes out of left field, and you have to keep up with that. It keeps you on your toes.

As for Kate Bosworth: any on-set canoodling?
Only when we were told to.

Fair enough. Do you think of yourself as a cheeky monkey?
[Laughs.] Yes. Definitely.

Finest British export to America?
Marmite.

I'm going to have to disagree. How about Posh and Becks? Where do you see them in 10 years?
I can see him becoming a huge basketball superstar and her becoming the greatest actress of all time.

OK, last question: As you get more and more famous, do you feel like your head is getting bigger and bigger or smaller and smaller?
[Laughs.] Well, I just got my hair cut, so it's definitely a little bit smaller. ✖✖✖

CHEAP EATS

Where 10 bucks makes a mighty meal

By Andrew Rimas Photographs by Alan Gwizdowski

I have always loved the smell of boiling grease. Rendered lard not only quickens my blood pressure, but also my heart. As a child, I remember scowling over my ransacked Happy Meal, feeling jealous of the nubs of other people's cheeseburgers. To me, Lord of the Flies isn't so much a Hobbesian parable as a really good story about roast pork, and Moby Dick is the Great American Novel on account of its generous seafood portions.

Of course, I adore foie gras and lobster tails and truffles shaved with aged Parmesan and all the other pleasures of the sophisticated table. But I still really like corn dogs. The ones from 7-Eleven. And those cheesy, little microwaved tacos they sell to drug addicts. I'm a fan of fast food. Street meat. The MSG Express. That doesn't mean that I admire bad cooking, just that I applaud the virtues of speed, grease and economy. My ideal lunch involves some sort of quick-moving bacon.

But when it fell to me to compile an exhaustive list of Boston's "cheap eats," I panicked. How can anybody with a single digestive system do justice to the universe of sub shops, pizzerias, butteries, greasy spoons, Asian take-outs, sandwich cafes, burrito joints and burger bars in town? The answer is, you can't. At least not without ending up in the coronary ward. The best you can do is embark on a personal odyssey, sailing the sloppy seas on winds of pinto beans and scanning the horizon for battered cod.

The fact that the economy's slithering down the drain like spilled noodle soup means that the future, for most of us, is less Jacques Pepin and more Boyardee. Still, for 10 bucks you can lay aside the can opener. These dishes from across the take-out spectrum are the proof in the deep-fried pudding.

RAMEN

Allston's Super 88 Food Connection is the sort of place that must show up a lot in Ronald McDonald's therapy sessions. You just can't justify the existence of the Big Mac meal in a city where you can find half a chau chow soy sauce duck for $8.75. Not for all the special sauce and all-beef patties in the world.

The food court itself cultivates a developing-world-airport chic, meaning it's all concrete, poor lighting and heavily laden immigrants. But what's lost in sterility is more than compensated for by the pervasive smell of crackling pork, which everyone knows is the most seductive odor in the world. Without years of spare time and several East Asian language dictionaries, it's impossible to make much of a dent in the thousands of dishes on sale. For instance, at Kantin, a traditional Cantonese open kitchen, you can buy seafood rice soup, or spicy, salted pork chops, or a seriously good beef chow fun for under $6. And somewhere a clown weeps into his chicken nuggets.

The best find in the whole place isn't even in the food court, but exiled to the hallway, like some miscreant schoolboy caught with his hand in the fortune cookie jar. To call Ken's Noodle House a hole in the wall is to be generous to wall-holes. Not only is it hard to locate, it's got the ambience of a poorly stocked broom closet. The soup, however, bears as much relation to the freeze-dried supermarket noodles as it does to subflooring. Which is very little.

Unless you lived on the right side of the trust-fund divide, you've probably experienced ramen noodle years. College students in particular know that nutrition and flavor can't stand up to the merciless economic determinism of six packets of ramen for a dollar. So long as there isn't a worldwide run on MSG, ramen will continue to be the staple of the financially insolvent, the shut-in and the stoned. Ken's isn't like that.

The broths, be they miso, "salty" or soy, are subtle and taste like real stock. Regular bowls come with a variety of toppings and cost about seven bucks. Or you can upgrade to a specialty ramen like the Sapporo, which is a miso base with imported noodles, roast pork, nori, vegetables and a boiled egg ($9.50).

PHO

It was during another national economic crapstorm that the Herbert Hoover campaign promised Americans "a chicken in every pot." Had Hoover been speaking today, he would have had to add, "accented by aromas of coriander, Thai basil and star anise, and served with a side of fresh shrimp spring rolls." Or he would have just done away with the chicken entirely, and thrown in a beef bone to make pho.

Vietnamese beef soup, served with vermicelli noodles, sliced steak, brisket, tendon and tripe, and sprinkled with scallions and bean sprouts, is to hot liquids what Cher is to gay iconography. The eponymous dish at Pho 2000 in Dorchester is one of the city's most consistent. A bowl deep enough to float a canoe costs $6.95.

FISH AND CHIPS

On Spain's Costa del Sol, two blocks from Marbella's jasmine-scented town square, there's a taberna that fries 30 different species of fish. Sea ray, plaice, bream, even the crunchy, little underage swimmers banned by EU law but sold with a wink and a mask of scrambled egg. Called the Altamirano, the owners subscribe to a philosophy that fresh fish is a virtue unto itself, so the dishes are hurried out without flair, politeness, nor any garnish more decadent than a lemon wedge.

Which is why the Morse Fish Company is so astounding. Its seafood is not only cheap, but so fresh and various as to arouse suspicion. How can the South End—a place where people are habituated to bleeding money—tolerate such a bargain? There must be something wrong. The fish must come from a Cambodian sweatshop. The place must be a front for a Scientology center. They must cook with trans fats.

When I walked into Morse Fish Company, I braced myself for a whiff of eau de haddock, the distilled reek of oil and marine death that drenches most fishmongers. Not so Morse. The air here is clean, as are the floors, the plastic furniture and, seemingly, the fillets laid in translucent mounds in the front display case. Bright, cheerful lighting does nothing to discourage the feeling of general sanitation, nor does the open kitchen in the back of the store. The menu lists nearly 20 species sold as lunch or dinner portions, accompanied by either fries or rice pilaf. A lunch order of whiting and chips brings three juicy slices of fillet for $5.95. Tilapia is a buck more. It's impeccably fresh and crisply battered. If Morse Fish isn't a cult, it ought to be.

CHICKEN

Hyde Square in Jamaica Plain is where Latin food congregates in inexpensive herds, particularly near the watering hole known as the Brendan Behan Pub. At La Pupusa Guanaca, you can nab a fresh Salvadorian pupusa, a stuffed cornmeal dumpling, for a dollar and change. The burritos, tacos and other homemade, stuffed edibles here are superior to anything available up the road on the more fashionable side of Centre Street, and the chicken empanada is a revelation in what you can do with a meat grinder and Salvadorian seasonings.

Down the block, a banner hangs over the window of Alex's Chimis, informing passersby that the restaurant is now open. What it doesn't tell you is that the best take-out roast chicken in Boston is sitting inside, quietly sweating. Alex's Chimis, though it does a respectable business in sandwiches, attracts pilgrims from all over the city on account of its roast bird. The skin is vigorously treated with garlic and spices and cooked to a crackle, while the flesh is as soft and moist as if it had been stewed in butter. Order a whole chicken and the server will hack it up with a couple of violent whacks from his butcher's knife, then serve the disjointed beast with a slew of fried plantains ($12.50 for a whole bird and side dish).

SANDWICH

Chris Schlesinger's All Star Sandwich Bar represents everything that's insufferable about Inman Square. There's a smirking element to the menu (a "funky" and "xtra funky" sandwich of the day), and knowing hipster touches like a jar of free Oreos at the cash register. You can almost hear the giggles behind the decision to carry Narragansett on draught and to charge $4.25 per glass. But dammit if the sandwiches aren't uncontrived slabs of delight.

While the Texas Reuben is an obvious pleasure, the Atomic Meatloaf Meltdown ($8.75) sticks in the memory. But not in the alimentary canal: The thick-cut loaf is doused in enough hot sauce to propel a Martian landing. Even so, its heat is gradual, only slowly smoldering past the envelope of jack cheese, red onion jam and grilled sourdough before setting fire to your intestinal lining. Less challenging is a side order of Canadian poutine, an addictive glop of French fries, cheese curds and gravy ($5.50) invented by Quebecois fur trappers to keep themselves warm on lonely nights when they were far from female company, but close to deep fryers.

Green beans on a bun is the unlikely basis of the chacarero sandwich at Chacarero on Province Street. In addition to steamed beans, this traditional Chilean snack packs Muenster cheese, avocado spread, fresh tomato, hot sauce and grilled steak or chicken ($6, small). The restaurant's founder, Juan Hurtado, originally sold the sandwiches out of a pushcart in Downtown Crossing, and office workers found the chacarero's charms—spongy homemade bread enveloping a snappy fusion of seasoned meat, sweet vegetables and pepper—far classier than the chain burgers on Washington Street. Today, Chacarero has its own storefront with picture windows and patio seating. A second location is due to open soon on Arch Street. And thus an empire was born. An empire of beans.

A more traditional sandwich can be had at Emedio's restaurant in the North End. That is, if your idea of a traditional sandwich is to serve a fine Italian meal on a loaf of crusty baguette instead of on a plate. The chicken pesto sandwich ($8.40), for example, can neither be carried in a briefcase nor eaten by a single, healthy person. It's long enough to make a serviceable flagpole, except it's dripping with garlicky pesto and juicy, whole chicken breasts, so any emblem you hang from it is liable to stain. Don't try this in a military cemetery.

Emedio's is a trattoria of the cloth napkin school, so while the sandwiches come in customary models like Italian cold cuts and chicken parm, the ingredients are several notches above sub shop standards. So is the flavor.

PIZZA

Pizza is like sex. Everybody thinks they're experts on the subject, especially Italians. The truth is, finding an edible, affordable slice is as simple as walking out the door with two bucks and a measure of lactose tolerance—it's something that most people can do. But as in anything universal, there's murderous disagreement over the minutiae.

Stepping across the crust vs. sauce divide, this article will make a stand on the side of toppings. After all, bread and tomatoes are wholesome sustenance, but dripping, oleaginous cheese is, if not the meaning of life, then a perfectly good reason to contract heart disease. In Boston, Upper Crust continues to roll out the most inspired pizza in town. Four types of chicken, asiago and Gorgonzola cheeses, baby shrimp, hearts of palm... the only limiting factor is the poor judgment of the customer (slice of the day, $3.50). A safe bet is to go with a specialty pie like the Lexington, topped with lobster fra diavolo.

In Cambridge, Emma's Pizza in Kendall Square is the most illustrious practitioner of haute pizza. Emma's toppings include glutton's fancies like thyme-roasted mushrooms or smoked mozzarella. Her crusts are of the crispy, thin variety, and she offers spicy rosemary red sauce or infused olive oil as alternatives to the customary oregano spread. But Emma's real strength is in her sweet, gourmet sausage, creamy feta and garlicky olives, making her adored by both the gastrogentsia and the casual slice-seeker alike (slice of the day, $2.25).

CURRY

Even in Beantown, legumes are underachievers. They lack the sass and sexiness of red meat. Or of white meat, or even of seasonal greens. At Cambridge's Punjabi Dhaba, though, lentils go glamorous. They're creamed and seasoned with exotic spices imported from the Punjab, then served with basmati rice and chutney ($4.95).

The nonvegetarian dishes at this noisy "roadside" Indian curry house, like the dhaba special chicken curry, are fragrant, rich and weirdly affordable ($6.95). Of particular value is the house special combo for two, a weighty platter of chicken and vegetable curries, samosas and pankoras, rice and half a tandoori chicken ($12.95). It's not dainty, but it's nourishing.

For single diners, the keema matar malalewala—a minced lamb curry with peas and peppers ($6.95)—more than compensates for the tinny ambience and crowded seating. But not for the televisions set to Indian pop videos.

TAKE-OUT CHINESE

A blind man with $10 in his pocket could walk down any street in Chinatown and, guided by nothing more than his sense of smell, eat like a Han Dynasty emperor. It's a truism that Chinatown is Boston's epicenter of cheap, superb dining. And it's another truism that King Fung Garden is one of the cheapest.

While the shabby booths and brown walls make King Fung look as if it had been decorated by a syphilitic bag lady, the kitchen does a booming business in Peking ravioli, pork chow fun and scallion pancakes. These are an especially precious find, since they're crispy and dense without losing their scallion taste in a wash of grease. Also superb is the hon sue beef ($8.75), a jumble of meat and onions that juggles sweetness and heat without ever tasting cloying.

King Fung is especially famous for its three-course Peking duck dinner, a meal that has to be ordered a day in advance, and which, at $34, fails to qualify as a "cheap eat." But it does qualify as popular. This duck, and of course the beloved scallion pancakes, have propelled King Fung into the echelons of the chain restaurant: A second kitchen opened recently in Brookline.

HASH

Brunch, like baseball, is a prickly subject, and often leads to inflammatory statements. Some people swear that the buttery fluff of the omelets at Sound Bytes is proof that God is, after all, a Somervillan; others are proud to wait in line outside JP's Centre Street Café, during a blizzard, wearing inadequate but carefully chosen vintage clothing, just to taste a creative frittata. But for a plate of fried eggs over-medium, you can't beat Mike's City Diner on Washington Street.

To the casual eye, Mike's looks like a standard retro-chic diner with checkered tablecloths, brassy waitresses and blithe disregard for colon cancer. But it straddles the breakfast scene like an obese colossus, spatula in one hand, acid reflux prescription in the other. The corned beef hash here is made on premises, mashing flaky beef with a marbling of potato and a light sprinkle of seasonings, giving it something of the texture of country pâté. Fried with Swiss cheese inside a three-egg omelet, it's a triumph in saturated fat, a perfection of lipids ($7.50). And the ham comes house-baked and carved off the bone.

AREPAS

The Venezuelan arepa is, like nearly every other successful culinary transplant, a variation on the sandwich. It's a grilled corn-flour pocket stuffed with either roast beef au jus, chicken and avocado, slow-cooked pork leg or any other gourmet filling concocted in the kitchen of the South End's Orinoco restaurant. Nuevo-Latino is what the media calls this trendy, cheery eatery, and it's overrun by nuevo-riche South Enders. But you don't need to pay attention to the open kitchen, the whimsical color scheme, the buzzing reviews and the imminent arrival of a second location in Brookline Village. All you need to know is that arepas cost $4.75–$5.95, and you must buy one. Try the guayanesa, which overflows with a type of Venezuelan cheese that's reminiscent of fresh mozzarella, except creamier. Nor is it a hardship to sample the empanadas jammed with stewed beef shreds or wild mushrooms, manchego cheese and salsa ($7.95).

GORDITAS

It takes more than 50 ingredients to make the molé poblano at Angela's Café in East Boston, so the odds are that at least one of them makes it too salty. Not so. The molé poblano with chicken, rice and beans, just like the enchiladas verdes and hand-smashed guacamole, is perfectly seasoned, expertly crafted and delicious. For a tiny dining room that's easy to miss (in a neighborhood that for many Bostonians is easy to miss), Angela's is winning mobs of devotees for its comida casera. Try the gorditas: chopped chicken and chorizo in homemade red salsa, green salsa or chipotle, nestled on a bed of fresh tortilla ($1.75–$2.50). The sunset-yellow walls add an extra kick of jaleo.

2008 Red Sox Sensation

By Nick Altschuller and Rich Levine

By Red Sox standards, it was an eerily quiet offseason in Boston. Theo signed everyone he needed to (most notably our cover guy Mike Lowell) and let go of those he didn't (most notably our future custodian Eric Gagne); no one did anything stupid (unless you count Bobby Kielty's haircut); hell, Manny didn't even demand a trade.

But don't be fooled by this lull in dramatic activity. These are the Boston Red Sox we're talking about... more accurately, the defending champion Boston Red Sox (yeah, that sounds better). In 2008, there will be action, there will be controversy, there will be blood. And what follows is our guide to all the potential highs and lows of the upcoming seven months.

For starters, we've got an interview with Lowell, the Sox' Gold Glove–caliber third baseman and reigning World Series MVP, who talks with us about his extensive charity work, hitting behind Papi and Manny, and kicking back with Bob Marley.

We also had an exhausting and exhaustive conversation with Steven Goldman, editor of the annual and award-winning Baseball Prospectus. A virtual sports encyclopedia, we picked his brain on a number of hot-stove Sox topics. Is Tek's bat a liability? Can Craig Hansen solidify the bullpen? Is Clay Buchholz ready to step into the rotation? Goldman shot the shit with us on those questions and much more.

And what would a Red Sox season be without a little boozing and betting? We've got you covered on both fronts with the unveiling of our official Red Sox drinking game (be ready to chug every time the RemDawg plugs himself) and a list of prop bets that should help you get your gambling fix.

We wrap things up with a list of all that's new at Fenway this spring, a look at the latest crop of Sox prospects and our second-annual tear-out calendar—an homage to a tobacco-chewing manager, Red Sox milestones and hardcore juicers. Rip it out, slap it on your fridge and enjoy another great season of Boston baseball.

PREPARE THE PARADE

No one knows for certain how the Red Sox will play in 2008, But that won't stop us from making sweeping predictions:

April
The long Japanese road trip, combined with the Sox killer April schedule—which includes a 10-game stretch against the Tigers, Yankees and Indians—spells early trouble for the team. Things aren't helped by Manny's trademark slow start or Lugo's continued struggles, and the Sox finish the month two games behind the upstart Blue Jays. Dan Shaughnessy writes a 5,000-word essay inexplicably blaming everything on Babe Ruth and the 1986 World Series and immediately gets a raise.

May
As the weather warms up, so does the Sox two-headed ace (who the press now calls Beckusaka). Beckett and Dice-K dominate the competition, as Boston finally gets into form and wins control of the AL East. JD Drew hits his stride as well, taking the league lead in ground outs to second base. He celebrates by using one of his paychecks to purchase a six-foot golden statue of himself with his bat on his shoulder.

June
Manny Ramirez and David Ortiz carry the team on their backs, hitting a combined 30 home runs this month. They are the modern-day Bash Brothers—minus the bacne, random fits of rage and microscopic testes.

July
Boston sends eight players to the All-Star game (July 15, at Yankee Stadium), including first timers Dice-K, Kevin Youkilis and Dustin Pedroia. Julian Tavarez goes along to throw BP to Big Papi in the home run derby and becomes the first player to ever be tossed out of the event for arguing balls and strikes.

August
Curt Schilling returns to the team after a full six months of rehab, but heads to the bullpen where he can limit his pitch count and solidify the middle relief. (Francona secretly admits, "I really just didn't want him sitting next to me in the dugout anymore.") Aug. 28 marks the last regular-season game the Sox will ever play in Yankee Stadium, and they send that heap of junk out in style, chasing Yankees starter Roger Clemens from the park in three innings and extending their division lead to 10 games.

September
With the division all but wrapped up, the Sox play it safe by shutting down every pitcher under 30 years old, leaving a two-man rotation of Tim Wakefield and Schilling (a throwback to how things were run back when the two debuted in the big leagues). They finish the month (and the season) getting swept at home by the Yankees, but it's only a moral victory for the Bombers, who have been out of playoff contention for weeks.

October
The Sox kick off the ALDS with the same lineup that brought them to glory in '07, and this year is no different. Beckett and Lowell lead another World Series run, culminating in a 4-2 series win against the Chicago Cubs. Dan Shaughnessy writes a 5,000-word essay inexplicably crediting Babe Ruth and the 1986 World Series and immediately gets a raise.

Note
We realize that we've potentially jinxed the Red Sox here on numerous levels, but our crystal ball doesn't lie. And, anyway, what would you like us to do, predict that they finish last? Apparently, we didn't really learn anything from the Patriots debacle.

Driving Home the Point

Photograph by Kerry Brett

Fresh off his World Series MVP and the signing of a new $37.5M contract, Mike Lowell's pretty happy here in Boston. And so were we, when the star third baseman called us from spring training.

Are you ready for the added pressure that comes with your recent success?
I think so. You just try not to think about that stuff, because if you do, you set yourself up for a lot of distractions. My goal is to be consistent with my production and drive in runs. I really don't worry about anything else. Just playing good baseball and driving in runs.

A lot of guys probably try to do that, but why have you been able to adjust so well to the spotlight in Boston while others have struggled so miserably?
I think it's a personality thing. Some people don't like the scrutiny here, but I understand it's a big market. If you accept that, then it's a lot easier to cope with. The thing about Boston fans is that they appreciate good baseball, and that's all I try to give them.

So we hear Big Papi's finally healthy, and that Manny exercised like a beast this winter and might be in the best shape of his career. Have you seen this first-hand?
Manny did come in great shape, and I think he's finally happy where he is. There were a couple of things the last few years that I think were distracting for both him and the team. But that's all settled. And David looks great. He's got a real hop in his step this year.

How do you spend your time when you're not with the team?
During the off-season I'm in Miami, so I get to enjoy the nice weather and hang out with my kids. I try and be as normal as possible—take them to school and stuff like that. I like going out on my boat and fishing as well. I really only take about two weeks off after the season, and then I'm back weightlifting and getting ready.

What about during the season? Do you and your wife go out on the town or is it tough to be in public?
We've lived right in the city the last two years and have enjoyed it like crazy. Any player on the Sox is recognizable, but you start to realize that more often than not, people are telling you something positive.

OK, let's do some rapid-fire questions. What's your favorite sports movie?
The Natural.

Favorite actor and/or actress?
Ooh, that's a good one. It's a tie for actor between Robert De Niro and Al Pacino. And I'm not sure on the actress.

OK, how about hottest actress?
I'll go with Salma Hayek.

Favorite musician of all time?
That's Bob Marley.

So you think we'll hear a little Marley playing on the loudspeakers when you come up to bat this year?
No way. That's way too mellow. Marley is for chilling out. As far as the music goes, a couple years ago the team picked this Black Sabbath song for me to come up to. That's not me at all, but I got a couple hits that day so I haven't changed it since.

Yeah. We wouldn't change a thing.

Man...on a mission

Mike Lowell isn't just a hero on the diamond. The four-time All-Star is also a cancer survivor. In 2001 Lowell and his wife, Bertha, launched the Mike Lowell Foundation, which supports low-income families in Miami and Boston struggling with the disease.

"When I was going through my treatment, I had great insurance and never had to worry about paying. It's such a trying time, and there [are] so many people, who on top of that, still have to worry about the financial side. So we set this up, not necessarily for research purposes, but to help people out with the cost of their treatment. We started in Miami, and now that I have more stability as far as knowing where I'm going to be for the next couple years, we can start doing more in Boston."

THE STATS TALK

STEVEN GOLDMAN is an editor at Baseball Prospectus, a think tank focused on the statistical analysis of baseball. We got Goldman on the phone to talk all things Sox, and the Bronx native promised to be impartial.

IMPROPER: Does the AL have Hideki Okajima figured out?
Steven Goldman: I don't think so. He had that rough patch at the end of the season, which might have been more fatigue, especially because he was able to rebound in the postseason. I don't sense a whole lot of skepticism about him. He has that rare commodity that he can go a little longer than one inning, but he's not 22, he's 32, so at the same time he has to be rationed a little bit. He's not someone you want to do spot match-ups with. But besides Papelbon and Okajima, whom did you really want to go to last year?

Do you think Craig Hansen could potentially grow into a reliable arm out of the bullpen, like we all expected after the Sox drafted him?
I was talking to our prospect guy, Kevin Goldstein, the other day and he really has his finger on scouting the deal with Hansen. When he was drafted he had an awesome slider. Scouting goes on a 20-to-80 scale for pitchers, and his slider was close to an 80. Now it's just not there anymore. It makes him a far more ordinary pitcher. It's one reason not to look at him as a savior. The thing that's kind of neat about bullpens, is that if you look at the top 50 relievers over any given season, by two years later, the list will have pretty much turned over. The fact that they don't have this great group behind Papelbon, Okajima and—probably—Delcarmen, isn't too worrisome.

How do you see the rotation progressing through the season with respect to Curt Schilling's injury, and is Clay Buchholz ready to step in?
Don't forget that Schilling is 72 years old. Even when he came back last year, he wasn't quite the fireballer of old. The thing that worries me about the rotation is Tim Wakefield and his physical problems. Knuckle-ballers are supposed to be ageless, but they're really not. The Sox will probably have to mix in some guys with the top three that they have. Josh Beckett and Dice K are great pitchers, and Buchholz is good enough—even on his inning limitations—to be a solid No. 3. Not too many teams can go three deep in their rotations, and they all have big drop-offs, but the Sox have guys who aren't quite as heralded, like Jon Lester—who's a functional pitcher, but he doesn't look like a coming ace to me—and I like David Pauley. I think these things will work themselves out.

What do you see happening with Coco Crisp? Will he be traded? Is there even a market for him?
There were so many center fielders on the market this winter, and Coco kind of fell through the cracks because he's not an annual Gold Glove candidate. I actually like him better as a left fielder, but his bat doesn't really play in the corner unless he's at the top of his game. He's really neither fish nor fowl. They're working against the perception that he's someone they need to get rid of, which isn't automatically the case. Depth-wise they are better with him, and I don't see a market with Crisp that gives you back something in the pitching department.

So do you think Jacoby Ellsbury is ready to claim the everyday center fielder role?
You saw Ellsbury for this small sample last year, but he might not be that guy. The kind of pop he showed is not indicative of his projections. He went for more extra bases last year than I see happening.

In your projections, which players does Ellsbury best compare with over time?
We have Gene Richards, who's an older guy, then Johnny Damon, Richie Ashburn and Vince Coleman, so it's kind of all over the place. The projection we're running for Ellsbury has a sub-.400 slugging and it was .509 last fall. There's nothing indicative of .509 from what he did in the minors. He's not everything you saw last year. I think he'll be somewhere around .350, which is not quite peak Johnny Damon.

Can we expect Julio Lugo to break out after a rough season, and if not, can Jed Lowrie challenge him for the starting spot?
Lugo's second half was a little better than the first, but what bothered me was that his first half seemed to be a continuation of the previous year where he was just sitting on the bench for the Dodgers and was just pathetic. Lugo's got to hit at least .275 to be even vaguely useful.

So we should look for Lowrie?
I'm a Lowrie fan, but the question about him is whether he has the glove to play shortstop. It's more a question of range. He was a college second baseman, and those guys usually don't go the other way. They aren't quite the athletes to handle the better position. That's why college second basemen are the most despised creatures on the face of the earth. If you're a college second baseman and can't play second in the pros, then there's not much else you can do.

Jason Varitek struggled at the plate last year, but we always hear his work with the pitching staff is invaluable. Is there any way to quantify that?
I feel like that contribution is often overrated. Some years ago, Keith Woolner did a study on catcher ERA and found that over time there's no real correlation between catchers and pitchers. That's not to say some aren't better than others, but the impact is much smaller than we're led to believe. Is there some value? Sure. Does every catcher that survives that long have that reputation? Pretty much. But if the Sox pitchers and staff believe that, then you just go with it. Even though Varitek's well past his peak offensively, he's not Brad Ausmus, and the Astros use that same argument [in regard to value with pitchers]. Last year Varitek slugged .400 and had a .360-something on-base percentage. Compared to the overall class of catchers, that's still very vital. The fall-off at catcher is huge. Look at Jorge Posada. He leveraged a four-year deal at 36. If you look at the catchers the Red Sox could have replaced Varitek with this offseason, you'd have a very hard time finding someone with .420 slugging and .350 on-base. He's declining but not hurting them.

Lastly, who wins the AL East this year?
It's going to be real interesting. The Red Sox have to be favored. They have a great, deep team. I think that the Yankees will be the competition as usual. They have at least two or three rookies in their rotation that look very promising, but we know that pitchers have a high attrition rate. They get hurt. Shit happens, basically. The Yankees don't have the experience that some teams might have in taking a 22-year-old guy and getting him to the majors as a successful pitcher. They never like younger pitchers. Those are muscles they've never exercised in the entire history of the Steinbrenner organization. If New York starts 9-11, they'll be under huge pressure to panic but the good news is they don't really have a choice. As far as the rest of the division, the Blue Jays will be about what they were and the Rays will take a step forward but I don't see them knocking on the door. It's going to be the Sox and Yankees. If the Yankees' pitchers catch up, they'll be there the whole way, but if not the Red Sox could run away with it.

Sox APPEAL

This season's upgrades are more subdued than in years past, but Janet Marie Smith, the park's senior VP of planning and development, helps us lay out the details of Fenway's ever-expanding master plan.

Futuristic "Width of Human Ass" Seats

Eight-hundred seats have been added in the State Street Pavilion, and open space has also been added along both lines, with a special "Standing Room Corner" constructed in left field. "Usually someone with a standing room ticket isn't sure exactly where to stand," Smith says. "Here there's a drinking station. You can lean on it. It gives you a place to put to put your hot dog."

No Sox in the Champagne Room.

Ah, the luxury box. Where people live out their caviar dreams, and no one can catch a foul ball. Eight new suites replace the six that went up for the 1999 All Star Game, and 12 pre-existing suites have been renovated. Let the wealthy have their luxury boxes. We're more comfortable in the open air, commingling with the Joe Sixpacks and Dennis Drinkwaters of the world.

Everyone's Fenway experience will be classed up with the addition of LED scoreboards. "The new ones will still have a traditional presentation," Smith says. "They're not going to be running cartoons." But what'll we watch during Rays games?

The Heart of Fenway

There are new seats, new sights and even a new restaurant—Beneath the Bleachers from the Lyons Group—opening around May. (Guess where?!) But Smith says the greatest addition has come through subtraction.

"The biggest upgrade is perhaps an overall focus on circulation," Smith explains. Two new stairways and an elevator give Fenway a needed angioplasty.

"This year, it's not the dramatic, sexy additions," Smith says. "They're the things that not many people think about but are terribly important."

Prop Bets

SEND WAGERS TO THE IMPROPER CAYMANIAN

The current trend in pitcher protection is to keep young hurlers from throwing 30 more innings than they did in the previous year. Clay Buchholz threw 119 in 2006 and 147 in 2007.
ODDS he throws over 178 in 2008—10 to 1. And if the Yankees are hot and the Sox are fighting for playoff positioning—10 to 1.

Last year, Julio Lugo batted for a career low and Sean "The Mayor" Casey's weight—.237.
ODDS Lugo bats over his career average (.271)—6 to 1.
ODDS he bats under the heft of the bench-warming mayor—3 to 1.

With his right shoulder strain, Curt Schilling could be out until July or done for good.
ODDS Curt "I will pitch with a dead man's foot" Schilling is back for the stretch run—4 to 1.
ODDS fans start clamoring for Bronson "Lock up your Northeastern daughters" Arroyo before the All-Star break—3 to 1.

Last season, Coco Crisp and Julio Lugo became the first Red Sox tandem to collect more than 25 steals since 1914.
ODDS Jacoby Ellsbury joins them, and the Sox have three players with at least 25 steals—4 to 1.

ODDS Big Papi breaks his personal best of 3 stolen bases—12 to 1.

Manny Ramirez is second all-time on baseball's career grand slam list with 20 (Lou Gehrig has 23), but it's been about two and a half seasons since Manny's managed to hit a granny.
ODDS He hits three grand slams to tie Gehrig: 25 to 1
ODDS He hits a grand slam: 10 to 1
ODDS He hits a grand slam but is subsequently called out for failing to touch first base: 15 to 1

ODDS that we'll actually pay up on any of these bets: Off the board.

RED SOX RESPONSIBLE DRINKING GAME

JACOBY ELLSBURY—Drink every time NESN shows a "Marry Me, Jacoby!" sign or a girl in a "Mrs. Ellsbury" T-shirt.

MANNY RAMIREZ—Drink for every extra-base hit. Double the number of drinks if his helmet stays on.

KEVIN YOUKILIS—Drink for every pitch he sees with the count 3-2. Drink double that number if he draws a walk.

DUSTIN PEDROIA—Double the inning when Pedroia first gets his jersey dirty and drink for that number.

MIKE LOWELL—Drink for every shot off the wall. Drink double if he's held to a single.

JASON VARITEK—Order a round for every Tek strikeout, because at least he's good with the pitchers.

DAVID ORTIZ—Drink to calm your nerves every time Papi slides into a base with the grace of a newborn giraffe.

J.D. DREW—Drink for 14 seconds (one for every million he's getting) for every double play over the next four years.

JULIO LUGO—Grab a snack every time the Hot Dog Don fails to get on base. Can't do all this imbibing on an empty stomach.

WILD CARDS: Drink through the entirety of each Remy/Orsillo laughing fit. Kill whatever you're drinking if Kyle Snyder is in before the fifth. If the game is on FOX, just drink.

Coming to a Jersey Near You

Mike Andrews, the founder of SoxProspects.com, helps us breakdown the future of the franchise.

Justin Masterson, P March 22, 1985
Strengths
He has an awesome sinker and his fastball can vary up a bunch of speeds. He can vary it by almost 10 mph.
Weaknesses
He probably has to improve his secondary pitches a little bit. His changeup isn't major league ready.
ETA
He'll probably be an August or September guy this year.
Best Case Scenario
A lot of people have compared him to Derek Lowe. He doesn't have the confidence issues, but can switch from starting to relieving like Lowe. He's like Derek Lowe plus.

Jed Lowrie, 2B/SS April 17, 1984
Strengths
He gets great at-bats, works the count and gets on base. He's very smart. Like a Pedroia.
Weaknesses
His glove has been cited as a problem over the years. It's improved, but it's still not there.
ETA
If Pedroia or Lugo got injured, I think he'd be the first one to get called up.
Best Case Scenario
I've compared him to Carlos Guillen, and I've also seen comps very similar to Pedroia.

Michael Bowden, P September 9, 1986
Strengths
Probably his all-around arsenal. He's got a lot of pitches that he can mix in.
Weaknesses
The secondary pitches still need a little work to get ill major league level.
ETA
He might get a cup of coffee this September but not as a big contributor.
Best Case Scenario
I think the high comp we've used is Chris Carpenter. The general projection is Jeff Suppan in his better years.

Ryan Kalish, OF March 28, 1988
Strengths
All around athleticism. He's got all the tools. Great speed. The power is power potential right now. It's just not there yet. Makes great contact and gets on base.
Weaknesses
There's not too many weaknesses. He's just raw.
ETA
It's September '09, but more realistically September '10
Best Case Scenario
The comp that we've used is Nick Markakis but he has potential to go further. Like a Johnny Damon type. The potential is really unlimited, so you don't know.

WRITE OF PASSAGE

Combining too many things often leads to disaster— pills and booze, cell phones and driving, business and pleasure. The Enormous Room's Four Stories reading series, however, defies the odds and creates a harmonious hybrid. Think of a 19th-century literary salon, minus the pantalettes, but with a DJ and decent tapas. Scott Heim kicks off this month's theme, Appearing and Disappearing, with passages from his novel We Disappear, a story about murder, obsession and motherhood. Alison Lobron, John Sedgwick and Laura Van den Berg round out the list of authors, while Michael Borum provides background tunes. MEG DUFFY

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Atonement ★★★ Director Joe Wright, who helmed 2005's rollicking, dynamic take on Pride and Prejudice, reteams with Keira Knightley, this time to tackle Ian McEwan's epic WWII downer. The first hour suggests we might be in for a masterpiece, as cinematographer Seamus McGarvey's camera restlessly prowls through the English country estate where Knightley's poor little rich girl pines for James McAvoy's hapless gardener. Class resentments simmer; sexual tensions sizzle; and a few tragic misunderstandings hurtle things headlong into disaster. Then along comes that pesky war, and Christopher Hampton's screenplay switches gears into more abstract, literary territory, and these vibrant flesh-and-blood characters recede into symbols. Wright desperately tries to hold our attention with an array of visual trickery, but even a breathtakingly staged, unbroken steadicam shot, winding its way around thousands of extras at the Dunkirk evacuation, can't touch the close-quartered intimacy of those early reels. The final kicker is a purely literary flourish, one that connects in the head but not the heart. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Bank Job ★★½ A cheeky screenplay by Dick Clement and Ian La Frenais gets a disappointing, meat-and-potatoes treatment from journeyman director Roger Donaldson in this purportedly true tale of layabout London blokes robbing a bank's safety deposit vault, circa 1971. Little do our heroes realize that they're being played by MI5, as shifty secret agents are aiming to recover incriminating photos of Princess Margaret at a Trinidadian orgy and set up Jason Statham and his small-time crew to take the fall. It's a goofy tall tale with plenty of nifty twists and turns, but the film sticks stubbornly to standard heist-movie conventions, never quite cutting loose enough to embrace the story's more ridiculous aspects. Statham seems miscast, too hard and hairy to be playing such a hapless fall guy. You'll spend most of the time waiting for him to beat the stuffing out of somebody. Amusing but lacking personality, The Bank Job cries out for the insouciant fizz Steven Soderbergh brought to his Danny Ocean capers. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Charlie Bartlett ★½ A perplexing mashup of Rushmore, Pump up the Volume and any 1980s John Hughes flick, director John Poll's confused ode to overmedicated youth stars the charmless Anton Yelchin as a poor, little rich kid expelled from countless private academies before becoming an extremely unlikely cult hero at a ramshackle public school. At first picked on for wearing a blazer and tie, the pompous lad soon starts holding impromptu bathroom psychotherapy sessions for his troubled classmates, recklessly distributing antidepressants and indulging them in the usual "parents just don't understand" sloganeering. Things take an even stranger turn when the students revolt against security cameras installed by their clueless principal, who, unsurprisingly, turns out to be just as depressed and confused as the kids he's attempting to discipline. The great Robert Downey Jr. works his typical magic with this largely unplayable role, and we share his befuddlement that a squishy, little nonpresence like Yelchin's Bartlett could inspire a mass rebellion. Ferris Bueller, he's not. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Chicago 10 ★★★½ Rude, boisterous and thrilling, Brett Morgen's well-assembled documentary shouldn't be confused with any of those scolding history lessons baby boomers often produce to salute themselves as the greatest generation. Exploding notions of hippy-dippy nostalgia with a soundtrack of Rage Against the Machine, Eminem and Black Sabbath, the movie alternates between footage of the 1968 Democratic National Convention riots and animated court transcripts of the farcical trial that followed. Morgen, who previously helmed the delightful Robert Evans biography The Kid Stays in the Picture, instills the film with a modern sense of urgency. Chicago 10 avoids talking heads and traditional doc devices in favor of a headlong immersion in the events. The courtroom hijinks are highlighted by hilarious vocal performances from Nick Nolte, as a Dubya–look-alike prosecutor, and the late Roy Scheider, as the judge who preached freedom of speech while simultaneously ordering Black Panther Bobby Seale to be gagged by bailiffs. (At Kendall Square.)

Definitely, Maybe ★½ Billed as a romantic comedy despite not being particularly romantic or comedic, writer-director Adam Brooks' brutally overlong feature stars Ryan Reynolds as a divorcing dad who decides to tell his cloying 11-year-old daughter (Little Miss Sunshine's Abigail Breslin, suddenly far too aware of her own cuteness) the story of how he met her mother. For reasons that don't make any sense, Reynolds changes everybody's name and launches into an epic bedtime dissertation on his entire dating history, keeping the kid in a cheap, pointless suspense as to which of these gals will turn out to be her actual mom. Is it Elizabeth Banks' sketchily drawn, Wisconsin good girl? Or maybe it's

TEENAGE WASTELAND

Paranoid Park continues Gus Van Sant's indie streak.

Paranoid Park
Starring Gabe Nevins, Taylor Momsen, Lauren McKinney, Jake Miller and Daniel Liu. Based on the book by Blake Nelson. Written and directed by Gus Van Sant. At Kendall Square Cinema.

DURING PARANOID PARK, Gus Van Sant's fragile, deep new film, we keep returning to images of young skateboarders soaring from ramps, being held aloft in slow motion for a few precious moments, and inevitably plummeting back to the pavement. This should probably be read as some obvious symbol for adolescence and falling from grace, but the movie's dreamy, mysterious textures make it trickier to parse. Van Sant is in a transcendental trance, and he hasn't so much adapted Blake Nelson's acclaimed young-adult novel as fragmented it into a hypnotic drift of alienation and reverie.

Van Sant on the set

A bit of explanation about Van Sant is in order, as his is by far the strangest career trajectory we've seen in quite some time. First he was an indie phenom, helming affectionate odes to scuzzy subcultures by casting a humanistic glow on Matt Dillon mainlining pilfered prescription meds in Drugstore Cowboy and teaming Keanu Reeves and River Phoenix in My Own Private Idaho, which remains the only big-screen adaptation of Henry IV to feature narcoleptic bisexual street hustlers.

The filmmaker's gutter romanticism brought just the right amount of street cred to Matt Damon and Ben Affleck's overly slick script for Good Will Hunting, and Van Sant soon found himself with not just an Oscar nod but a bona-fide blockbuster. Naturally he capitalized on Hollywood's belated warm and fuzzy embrace with... a shot-for-shot remake of Hitchcock's Psycho?

One of those notorious flops that suffers the indignity of becoming a national punch line weeks before it's even released, Van Sant's Psycho is a fascinating idea for a graduate dissertation exploring film nerd questions about authorship, and whether directorial characteristics can be transferred simply through matching compositions. As it turns out, the answer is no, and the movie is kind of horrible. But for my money, Van Sant's career nadir didn't arrive until two years later, when he served as a gun for hire on the assembly line treacle Finding Forrester, home to Sean Connery's classic line, "You're the man now, dawg!"

Lucky for us, Van Sant turned his back on Hollywood and was creatively reborn in a series of collaborations with cinematographer Harris Savides. Gerry, Elephant and Last Days form an unofficial "death trilogy" that trash conventional notions of dialogue and plot development in favor of free-floating meditations on mortality marked by long tracking shots and deafening silences. Borrowing liberally from British filmmaker Alan Clarke and Hungarian legend Béla Tarr, Van Sant's audacious plunges into the avant-garde leave audiences either mesmerized or infuriated.

Paranoid Park finds a happy medium between Van Sant's recent experiments and the demands of an actual movie. For starters, there's a plot. Sort of. Gabe Nevins (a non-actor recruited, like most of the cast, via MySpace) stars as Alex, a sad-eyed and troubled young skateboarder who alternates between denying and coming to terms with his complicity in the accidental death of a security guard near a skate park.

There's a full police inquiry, complete with a chatty Columbo-esque detective (Daniel Liu), but Van Sant seems far more interested in investigating the protagonist's shell-shocked mind-set. He frames the narrative as Alex's discursive journal entry, and thus the film glides across time with each scene temporally unmoored from the previous, each a piece of the puzzle we need to assemble.

Nevins has a wonderfully blank, guarded expression, and while he wanders down endless high school corridors with a disjunctive soundtrack sampling everything from Beethoven to Elliott Smith to Nino Rota's score from Juliet of the Spirits, Van Sant captures something strange and ineffable about the roiling inner turmoil of adolescence. Parents and teachers are always glimpsed out of focus, like the disembodied authority figures of a Peanuts cartoon.

Alex copes by trying to bleed into the background, serving as the silent bystander in every social interaction, claiming not to have an opinion on the Iraq war and barely even reacting to his own deflowering. It's a shame the title I'm Not There is already taken, as Alex never really seems present until the one night his passivity gets somebody killed.

Brilliantly shot by rock-star cinematographer Christopher Doyle and his partner Rain Kathi Li, Paranoid Park is a visual feast that integrates everything from 35mm to Super 8 and opens apertures midscene in ways that will make film school instructors cry. Heartsick and occasionally maddening, the movie leaves you with a dizzy, vertiginous feeling. Sort of like one of those skateboarders we keep returning to, right as they're crashing back down to Earth. ✖✖✖

Rachel Weisz's hard-nosed journalist? How about Isla Fisher's dippy, free spirit? The more important question is who cares? None of these women are especially fascinating, and they don't have much reason to be interested in Reynolds, a tedious blank who somehow spends 16 years in New York City running into the same three women. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Four Months, Three Weeks and Two Days ★★★ It's not a knock to call Cristian Mungiu's drama punishing, as the movie is a grinding, expertly crafted slice of Eastern European misery. Winner of the Palme d'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival and scandalously absent from this year's list of foreign language Oscar nominees, the movie keeps the camera at a discreet distance, adopting a cinéma vérité style as we follow kind-hearted Otilia (Anamaria Marinca) hustling around crumbling 1980s Romania trying to arrange an illegal abortion for her hapless roommate (Laura Vasiliu). Mungiu plays scenes out for longer than you expect, shooting in wide screen with a static camera that lingers on details and inferences inside haunting, prolonged silences. Extraordinarily well wrought, the movie is also a bit fuzzy and hard to pin down. Is Otilia a saint, a flesh-and-blood character, or just an angry filmmaker's symbolic dumping ground for a cruel world's abuses and ills? (At Waltham Embassy.)

In Bruges ★★★½ We could probably go the rest of our lives without sitting through another indie about wisecracking hitmen, but hell-raising U.K. playwright Martin McDonagh's droll, affecting feature accomplishes the impossible by breathing new life into moldy pulp-fiction tropes. Closer in spirit to Elaine May's Mikey and Nicky or the works of John Cassavetes than any recent Tarantino knockoff, In Bruges is a shaggy, discursive trip into purgatory with a couple of ratty souls that might yet be saved. The medieval Belgian city, with its canals, architectural marvels and hordes of morbidly obese American tourists, serves as a Dante-esque way station for chattery, presumably doomed anti-heroes Ray (Colin Farrell) and Ken (Brendan Gleeson). McDonagh's tossed something to offend nearly everyone into his big-screen debut, but what's surprising is that for all the drugs, fisticuffs and potty-mouthed swagger, the film is surprisingly spiritual. There's a hefty helping of Irish Catholic angst here, with real questions of sin and redemption at stake. An unexpected delight. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Miss Pettigrew Lives for a Day ★★★ Light as a feather but irresistible all the same, this tender screwball farce stars Frances McDormand as a stern British governess who blunders her way into serving as a "social secretary" for a ditzy American torch singer (Amy Adams) living in London on the eve of World War II. McDormand's no-nonsense Pettigrew makes a surprisingly effective maternal crisis manager, as she attempts to guide the wannabe actress away from moneyed suitors and toward a rakish and penniless piano player (Lee Pace) with true love in his eyes. Director Bharat Nalluri keeps things brisk, only occasionally erring with a bit too much door-slamming slapstick. The film works best in its quieter moments, particularly the touching connection that blossoms between the dowdy nanny and a gentlemanly lingerie designer, played quite nicely by Ciarán Hinds. Co-adapted by Full Monty screenwriter Simon Beaufoy from Winifred Watson's novel, this is the kind of movie you can take your mom to. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and West Newton Cinema.)

No Country for Old Men ★★★★ Adapted from the 2005 novel by Cormac McCarthy, Joel and Ethan Coen's No Country for Old Men is an enthralling, devastating movie experience. Stripped to the bone, it's a model of ruthless narrative efficiency that blossoms into something much larger than the sum of its precision-tooled parts. What at first seems like the simple saga of two tough hombres and a bag of money eventually attains a mythic, almost Biblical grandeur. For days afterwards, it haunts your dreams—the bad ones. The Coens have at last gone back to their roots, infusing No Country with the clockwork meticulousness and parched landscapes of their killer 1984 debut, Blood Simple. The movie is almost unbearably suspenseful and boasts the filmmakers' trademark strain of sicko gallows humor. But there's also something new here: a palpable sense of sorrow and genuine emotional resonance. For the first time in their brilliant career, it finally feels like the merry pranksters are out to do more than crack themselves up. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

The Other Boleyn Girl ★½ Too uptight to work as camp and far too silly to be taken seriously, director Justin Chadwick's unintentionally hilarious adaptation of Philippa Gregory's best-selling bodice-ripper stars Natalie Portman and Scarlett Johansson, both apparently battling to see who can give the most anachronistically unconvincing performance. The bickering sisters catfight for the affection of Eric Bana's dour, heir-obsessed Henry VIII, a feud that results in a lot of crocodile tears, beheadings and, eventually, Protestantism. But don't expect any mention of Sir Thomas More or Cardinal Wolsey in this Us Weekly version of English history. Photographed by Keiran McGuigan in bleary high-def video, The Other Boleyn Girl lacks even the simple visual pleasures of dopey costume epics by locking into claustrophobic close-ups with inexplicably obscured foregrounds. Screenwriter Peter Morgan fared far better with modern royals in his wonderful script for 2006's The Queen, a work every bit as funny and perceptive as this one is obvious and dull. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Persepolis ★★★½ Buoyant and irreverent, Marjane Satrapi's best-selling coming-of-age comic book memoir springs to life as the simplicity of black-and-white line drawings trump the computer-generated marvels we've grown accustomed to. Growing up as an outspoken female in Iran sounds like the formula for a movie far less lively, but the tone boasts a sardonic wit matching that of its spitfire heroine. (No surprise then that Satrapi directed the film along with French animator Vincent Paronnaud.) Her childhood memories of the Shah's fall and the subsequent rise of Islamic fundamentalism offer a refreshing, humanistic point of view on Middle Eastern history. Young Satrapi's punk-rock attitude and black-market Iron Maiden cassettes lead to a brief exile in Vienna before she returns and, quite movingly, attempts to assimilate into a culture where she's no longer welcome. Persepolis is funny, rambling and sad, and a welcome reminder that stubborn individualism can be found where we least expect it. (At Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner, West Newton Cinema and in the suburbs.)

Semi-Pro ★★ Will Ferrell's fourth sports spoof in less than three years finds the comedian coasting on his usual clueless white-guy shtick. As owner, coach and power forward of a floundering basketball team, Ferrell's Jackie Moon hustles, jives and even wrestles bears in an attempt to save his franchise from extinction. Fashion choices and '70s music are presented as hilarious in and of themselves, and before long, the absurdist set pieces begin to intrude on what becomes a straighter, grittier roundball flick. After Woody Harrelson shows up as a washed-up former champ looking for redemption, Ferrell's role starts to feel more like a supporting part beefed up to cater to his ego. Fouler in language and temper than Ferrell's previous outings, Semi-Pro is crowded with improv turns from Will Arnett, Andy Richter and The Bad News Bears' Jackie Earle Haley. Despite a few chuckles here and there, the sense of déjà vu is oppressive. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Vantage Point ★½ What happens when you watch a crummy 24 knock-off from a bunch of different angles? It turns out to be the same stupid movie over and over again. Written by first-timer Barry Levy with all the hopped-up gusto of a freshman film, this laughably unconvincing thriller follows a presidential assassination attempt in the crowded city square of Salamanca, Spain. The gimmick here is that the movie keeps stopping, rewinding and starting all over again from different locations featuring the hammy stylings of a different B-list actor. Dennis Quaid appears grim and constipated as a jittery secret service agent, while Forest Whitaker hyperventilates as a tourist who saw too much through his video camera. Director Pete Travis' debut has nothing to say about shifting perspectives as the temporal hiccups and shifting points of view are simply expository and only serve to jerk the audience around. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Time Well Spent

All Nacht Long Excellent cinema can fly by (which is why Gigli seemed to last for days). Running just over 15 hours, Berlin Alexanderplatz is the mother of all character studies, examining a small-time crook and the area of Berlin where he lives, loves and thieves. Fortunately for us and our retinas, the ICA's screenings will occur in a blessedly broken-down manner, spanning four segments over four days—meaning you won't have to ration your popcorn or construct a lean-to to ensure survival. Called one of Time magazine's 100 Best Films and often named director Rainer Fassbinder's magnum opus, its accolades carry considerable weight. Check out the first installment of this masterpiece March 27 at 7 pm and engage in the second-best way to kill 15 hours. (Next to Facebook, of course.)

Music { PAUL ROBICHEAU }

Morcheeba plays the Somerville Theatre March 27.

TRIP-HOP HEROES

Morcheeba taps new singers to filter trip-hop through a folk-blues prism.

Steve Gullick

MORCHEEBA MADE ITS SPLASH in the '90s as a frontrunner in England's "trip-hop" movement, dropping chilled-out beats and atmospheres behind Skye Edwards' serene vocals. Now, with focal point Edwards long gone from the mix, several vocalists take turns on the band's fluid new Dive Deep, which draws on folk-blues like a modernized Fleetwood Mac or Traffic. Morcheeba cofounder Ross Godfrey even cites Fleetwood Mac's 1977 hit album Rumours as an inspiration.

"They'd been through a lot of different singers and craziness in that band," Godfrey says of Fleetwood Mac, co-fronted on Rumours by Lindsey Buckingham, Stevie Nicks and Christine McVie. continued on next page

"Instead of it being the same singer all the time, it was like a movie where you get different actors. You get the same story from different perspectives. We're cinematic in the way that we want to make records."

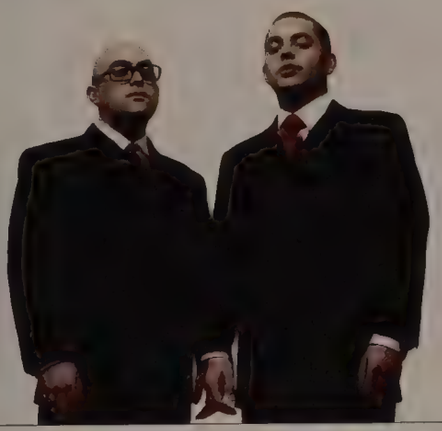
As such, Morcheeba brought in male voices Bradley Burgess, rapper Cool Calm Pete and Norwegian star Thomas Dybdahl as well as singers Julie Tzuke and Manda, a French newcomer who contacted the group through Myspace. "She said it was her dream to sing on a Morcheeba record, and we thought it would be rude if we didn't let her," says guitarist Godfrey, who guides the band with his producer/DJ brother Paul. "There weren't loads of crazy people saying 'Can I sing on your record?' These were quite good singers.

"We always enjoyed working with Skye, but there was a limit on what we could do, things that we could write that would sound good with her," Godfrey says from the brothers' tiny English hometown of Hythe. "When we formed Morcheeba, we were actually looking for a male singer. We wanted someone like Stephen Stills, with a cool, soul-folky voice. But we could never find one."

Stephen Stills? Fleetwood Mac? Not what people might expect as fodder for hip trip-hop avatars. "My brother was more into modern electronica and I was more into acid rock, and Morcheeba is kind of a meeting of the two," says Godfrey, 31, adding that he and Paul, 34, grew up on Jimi Hendrix, Neil Young, blues and hip-hop. "When we were kids, there was all this New Romantic rubbish and we really didn't like that. So we'd listen to New York hip-hop, and Nina Simone and Cat Stevens from our parents' record collection."

As Paul began to DJ, they framed a groove-based blueprint for Morcheeba. "It was probably from smoking too much pot, but we were always very slow," Godfrey says of their sound, noting the band's name came from cheeba, a slang term for marijuana. "It had to be a very mellow club we'd be playing in."

When it comes to the original trip-hop aesthetic of slow, jazzy hip-hop atmospheres, he says, "It's the same thing people are doing now, matching the old and the new. That's kind of what Amy Winehouse sounds like—and most singers coming out of England who are trying to do something fresh. They're still mixing modern, programmed stuff with more retrospective. It's like cherry-picking from the whole chronology of music.



"We're kind of a lucky generation in that sense," Godfrey says. "My generation really never had a scene. There was never punk. We weren't defined by one thing that we have to live with for the rest of our lives. We're always kind of like magpies going about and stealing little bits."

The bits settle nicely on Dive Deep, which includes a cool cover of British folkie John Martyn's "Run Honey Run." And the disc's roots-conscious vibe extends to originals. "We wrote in a very traditional way," Godfrey says, "then we'd play acoustic guitars and Hammond organs, and technology would come in more through editing and sound manipulation."

That sound also will get reconfigured when the Godfreys take the group on a tour that hits the Somerville Theatre March 27, with Manda and bassist Burgess splitting vocals over a back line that includes keyboards and live drums.

"It's a completely different beast, and we don't try to recreate what we did in the studio," he says. "We don't bring along laptops and have sequences of electronic stuff, 'cause that feels like it stunts the band a bit.... The band sorta sounds like Booker T and the MGs with a scratch DJ." ***

Benin There, Done That

Angelique Voice If you've ever heard a soulful voice steaming through the cafe speakers as you sip your latte, then you've been struck by the sound of Angélique Kidjo. Fresh off her first Grammy win for her 10th album, Djin, Djin, Kidjo will take the stage for a two-night engagement at the Somerville Theatre, March 21 and 22. A native of the tiny West African nation of Benin, Kidjo's humanitarian efforts and worldwide popularity led to her selection as a UNICEF Goodwill Ambassador in 2002. On her latest studio offering, she incorporates the traditional percussion-driven music of her home country with some of the western hemisphere's biggest names. Who else could get Josh Groban and Ziggy Marley on the same album? Her energetic performance promises to bring a healthy dose of West African sunshine to Boston's gloomy March. World music aisle-browsers, rejoice! Rebecca Buckley
